WILMINGTON, Del., Nov. 14.—Thirty-five hundred persons this afternoon saw the famous pacer, Directum I., owned by James Butler of the East View Stock Farms of New York, pace a mile against time in 2:03¾ at Wawaset Park. Directum I. was driven by G. Raymond Snedeker, his driver and trainer, and paced against a runner. Directum got three workout miles before he started for a record. Ten days ago Directum 2, went a mile over the Kirkwood kite-shape track in 1:59½. In the workouts, Directum I.'s driver did not allow the horse to extend himself to his utmost and kept him from going eight seconds below the two-minute mark.

ILLINOIS IS CHAMPION.

Defeats Chicago University for Western Conference Title.

URBANA, Ill., Nov. 14.—The University of Illinois made certain of the conference football championship today when the fastest team the Illini have had in many years, headed by back field stars Pogue and Clark, defeated the University of Chicago by 21 to 7, while at Minneapolis Wisconsin lost to Minnesota, 14 to 3. Chicago scored early in the game and maintained a lead until the third period, when the score was evened. In the fourth period, with the score 7 to 7, Illini's brilliant attack wore away the stubborn Maroon defense. Spectacular runs by Pogue and Clark took the ball to the Maroon five-yard line, where Pogue shot over. On the next kick-off Clark caught Des Jardien's punt on the Illini five-yard line and ran through the entire Chicago team for the final touchdown.

Illinois played an open game almost entirely, using double and triple passes, forward passes, and "spread" formations. Chicago was successful in breaking up forward passes, and neither team made any ground to speak of by the play. Capt. Des Jardien's punting was a big factor in staying off the Illini backs.

Athletic Field for Rochester.

Special to The New York Times.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., Nov. 14.—The Trustees of the University of Rochester will provide an athletic field of sufficient size to accommodate all university sports, according to an announcement made at a mass meeting of undergraduates and alumni in the alumni gymnasium last night. A tract of land amounting to fifteen acres will be purchased at an approximate cost of $30,000. The new field lies between Atlantic Avenue and Main Street East, at Culver Road, and will be within easy walking distance of the campus. Plans are under way to put the new field in shape for all classes of intercollegiate sports, its size being sufficient to accommodate several baseball diamonds, football and soccer fields, and tennis courts. A grand stand with ample accommodations for large crowds will be erected, while accommodations for visiting teams and undergraduate athletes, including a plunge, are in the plans. The [illegible] when completed [illegible] in the state.

CLEAN SLATE FOR UNION.

Wins Eight Straight Games and Closes Season Without Defeat.

Special to The New York Times.

SCHENECTADY, Nov. 14.—By defeating Hamilton here this afternoon in the closing game of the season Union made football history for the college, with eight victories in eight games played. Never before has Union gone through a season without defeat or tie game.

Five thousand fans, the biggest crowd that ever saw a college game here, turned out for today's contest and enjoyed seeing Union carry off the honors by the score of 26 to 7. From the start Union worked on the offense, and in the first half the team made its downs nine times, as compared with three for Hamilton, and gained 153 yards to 54.

Although Hamilton fought hard to the end, it was practically conceded at half time that a victory for the Buff and Blue was next to an impossibility. Both teams used the open style of play, and innumerable forward passes were tried.

The longest pass came in the third period, when Jake Beaver threw the ball forty-three yards to Cleveland for a touchdown. A few minutes later Beaver featured again by a twenty-five-yard pass to Girling after dodging two tackles in clever style while still holding the ball. For Hamilton, Laforce and Schwartz were the individual stars, figuring in fully two-thirds of the plays, and both big gainers. The line-up and summary:

MICHIGAN LOSES TO CORNELL ELEVEN

Yost's Team Has Its Worst Season Under His Long Tutelage.

ANN ARBOR, Mich., Nov. 14.—Cornell today clearly outclassed Michigan and won, by a score of 28 to 13, thereby closing for the Wolverines their most disastrous season, in point of defeats, since Fielding H. Yost has coached the eleven. Never before during the fifteen years Yost has been at Michigan, has a Maise and Blue eleven lost three games in one season. Of her four inter-sectional battles this year, Michigan won but one game, the Pennsylvania contest.

Barrett, the Cornell quarterback, was the brightest star in this afternoon's game. Time and again he eluded the Michigan tacklers for long runs and his last play was a thrilling dash from his own forty-yard line through the whole Wolverine eleven, for the final touchdown of the game. As he fell over the goal line, Splawn threw him so hard he had to be carried from the field, Schuler and Phillipi, also pierced the Michigan line for many yards. Phillipi got three of the visitors four touch downs.

Maulbetsch was practically the only successful ground gainer for Michigan. Lineup and summary:

Michigan.	Position.	Cornell.
Raynsford	Centre	Cool

Penn Wants Folwell as Trainer.

Bob Folwell, the former University of Pennsylvania football star, who has met with great success as coach of the strong Washington and Jefferson eleven, is reported to be in line to become head trainer of the Philadelphia College football team next year. Reports from Washington, Penn., indicate that Folwell's Alma Mater is calling him. It is admitted at Penn that George Brooks, coach of the Red and Blue gridiron men, is under contract for at least one more year. But, according to Washington and Jefferson men, this has not prevented the Quaker authorities from seeking the services of Folwell, following the splendid record his W. and J. team has made in the last couple of seasons. It is a question whether Penn can get Folwell from W. and J., for he is the idol of every undergraduate, as well as players and graduates of the latter college. Brooks would be retained by Pennsylvania, the story goes, until his contract term expires, but Folwell would be the real head

N. Y. U. CRUSHES STEVENS 'TECH'

Delayed Pass a Strong Factor in Violet Eleven's Victory in Hoboken.

New York University defeated Stevens "Tech" yesterday afternoon at Castle Point Field in a very snappy game by the score of 31 to 0. The New York boys had the better of the argument throughout the game except in the first period, when the Stevens boys played their best. Then New York started on a march down the field that was not checked. The delayed pass proved to be the greatest ground-gainer for N. Y. U., although they netted some gains on forward passes. The Stevens line was a mountain of strength against straight line-plunging.

The Engineers seemed to go to pieces in the second period after the first four plays, in which they held N. Y. U. for downs, but Anderson was soon forced to kick, Olswang signaling for a fair catch. In a series of delayed passes, which Stevens was unable to fathom, the Violet men rushed the ball down the field, Capt. Huntley going over for the first score of the game. Weiner failed to kick the goal.

Webb kicked off to Schuck. N. Y. U. used delayed passes, but were forced to kick. Anderson of Stevens fumbled the punt and the ball was again New York's on the eighteen-yard line. Bernstein then made first down and Huntley scored for the second time, and Weiner again missed the goal.

Webb kicked off to Huntley, who ran the ball back twenty-five yards and then made repeated gains for the Violet team. Stevens was penalized half the length of the field for rough work. A forward pass then gave N. Y. U. the ball on the thirty-one-yard line, Huntley again scored, and again Weiner failed to kick the goal. The period and half ended with the score N. Y. U., 18; Stevens, 0.

Cusack of N. Y. U. started the second half by kicking off to Webb, who ran the ball back fifteen yards, only to lose ten of them on the next play. Having punted, N. Y. U. was penalized fifteen yards for holding, and lost another, Poole breaking up the play. Huntley punted to Todd, but soon recovered the ball when Parks intercepted a forward pass. The ball again changed on the next play, N. Y. U. fumbling. Cusack, coming through and blocking a punt, opened the way for N. Y. U.'s next touchdown, Bernstein going over on a delayed pass. Weiner kicked the goal. The Violet team then put in second-string men and Stevens' backs had an easy time for the rest of the quarter.

N. Y. U. had things their own way in the last quarter, scoring on a long forward pass, Huntley to Parks, but Cusack failed on an attempt for a field goal from the thirty-five-yard line. Line-up and summary:

New York.	Position.	Stevens.
Hagemeyer	Left guard	Odell
Raschbaum	Centre	Hill
Cusack	Right guard	Moeller

ANDOVER OVERWHELMED.

Exeter Football Team Crushes Its Old Rival, 78 to 7.

Special to The New York Times.

ANDOVER, Mass., Nov. 14.—Exeter handed Andover the severest jolt in the history of their football relations this afternoon when it defeated its old rival by the overwhelming score of 78 to 7. The Exeter backs ran through the Andover line and around its ends at will, piling up 55 points in the first half.

Andover's score came in the first period when Gould received a forward pass from Fitzgerald and ran 35 yards.

Andover was clearly outclassed not only in weight, but in execution of plays. Whenever Exeter got possession of the ball it was a steady march down the field with plays alternating off tackles and around the ends with an occasional plunge through centre for gains of 10 and 15 yards. The line-up:

Exeter.	Position.	Andover.
Wehner	Centre	Avery

Notre Dame Beats Carlisle 48 to 6.

CHICAGO, Nov. 14.—The crippled Carlisle Indians were no match for Notre Dame in the game played here today, the final score being, Notre Dame, 48; Carlisle, 6. Welsh, the Chippewa quarter back, was badly injured in the last quarter. He was removed in an unconscious condition to a hospital, where an examination was begun in the fear that the base of his skull had been fractured.

The punting of Cofall, who scored a field goal from the 35-yard mark, and his runs, together with those of Eichenlaub, Pliska, Bergman, and Fehlen, and the returns of punts by Bergman were features of the Notre Dame offense. Capt. Calac was the star for the Indians, although the whole team fought gamely and were badly battered when they left the field.

Carlisle got the ball on Notre Dame's 22-yard line on a fumble, and on three plunges Calac carried the ball across for the team's only touchdown.

ARMY AND NAVY TEAMS RUN UP BIG SCORES--- DETAILS OF PRINCETON AND YALE GAME

ARMY FINDS MAINE AN EASY OPPONENT

Oliphant and McEwan Play Remarkable Game Against the Easterners.

Special to The New York Times.

WEST POINT, N. Y., Nov. 14.—With nearly all the 'Varsity players on the side lines, the Army defeated Maine here today in easy fashion by a score of 28 to 0 in a game which promised to be dull and uninteresting at the start, but later developed into one of the most sensational contests staged on the local gridiron this season. To Oliphant, formerly of Pardue, and big McEwan, the Minnesota giant, are due the honors of the day. Both husky Westerners were the main strength of the Army's patched-up eleven today, Oliphant by his sensational work in the back field and McEwan by his wonderfully effective defensive playing and bowling interference, which aided the Army to two of its touchdowns. The Cadets showed poor form throughout the first half, scoring but once during the second period, when Oliphant rang up a touchdown after a dash off tackle from the 5-yard mark.

Maine's fine display of defensive strength twice robbed the Army of touchdowns during the early periods, the Cadets rushing the ball both times to the 1-yard line, but failing in every effort to carry it over. Oliphant tossed a forward pass to Tully, who ran to a score early in the third quarter, and in the last period the former Purdue athlete caught a punt on his own 30-yard mark and dashed to a touchdown through the whole Maine team, aided by the fine work of McEwan, who put man after man out of the running on the way to the goal line. A moment later he ran 70 yards for another score with McEwan's help from a fake kick formation going around Reardon's end and through a broken field. He kicked four goals from touchdowns, and aside from the fact that he and McEwan were the whole Army team in themselves, there is nothing more to tell. As for Maine, the Downeasterners' offensive was the weakest seen here in Fall and Ruffner's punting was pitiable to watch. Their two flashes of defensive strength were the only redeeming feature of their play. The line-up:

Army.	Positions.	Maine.
McEwan	Centre	Baker
Herrick	Right guard	Gulliver
Larkin	Right tackle	Wiley
Tully	Right end	Reardon
Oliphant	Quarter back	Bernhelsel
Mitchell	Left half back	Gorham
Van Fleet	Right half back	Ruffner
Coffin	Full back	Martin

Touchdowns—Oliphant, (3,) Tully. Goals from touchdowns—Oliphant, 4. Substitutions—Army: Prickett for Kelly, Timberlake for Jones, Goodman for McEwan, McEwan for Goodman, Holmes for Herrick, Weyand for Larkin, Bringham for Tully, Britton for Bringham, Harmon for Oliphant, Coffin for Harmon, Walker for Mitchell, Mitchell for Walker, Boots for Mitchell, Herrick for Coffin, Oliphant for Harmon. Maine: Moulton for Rudman, Kirk for Gorham. Referee—Mr. Thorpe of De La Salle. Umpire—Mr. Lenheim of Chicago. Head linesman—Cadet Prichard. Time of quarters—Two of ten minutes and two of twelve minutes.

Cahall Star in Lehigh Victory.

Special to The New York Times.

SOUTH BETHLEHEM, Penn., Nov. 14.—Lehigh today beat Villanova, 10 to 0, but only after the hardest kind of a fight. It was "Billy" Cahall, whom experts are heralding as the best half back in the East, who made nine of Lehigh's punts, representing a goal from the field and a touchdown. He played a wonderful game for Lehigh, being in almost every play and made the longest run of the day. It was not until the fourth period that Lehigh could score. In Villanova's line the hardest kind of a proposition was met. Even though Lehigh made six or seven dozen first downs, they did not come consistently enough to enable the Brown and White players to score a touchdown during the first three periods. However, Lehigh came near enough to Cahall to try four attempts at field goals, but the Lehigh line failed to hold and he was so fortified these times that the attempts fell short. The last attempt was fumbled by Frazier of Villanova and Tate fell on the ball for Lehigh on the 25-yard line. On the first play Chenoweth made a forward pass to Cahall, who galloped over the line for a touchdown. Hoban kicked the goal. Line-up:

Villanova.	Position.	Lehigh.
J. Reap	Left end	F. W. Green
Lynch	Centre	Early
Mahan	Right guard	Pons
Ta Reap	Right tackle	Gilson
Connors	Right end	Chapman
Ward	Quarter back	Chenoweth
Frost	Right half back	Hoban
Prendergest	Full back	Halsted

Touchdown—Cahall. Goal from touchdown—Hoban. Goal from field—Cahall.

Substitutions: Villanova—Dougherty for McGuicken, McGuicken for Ward, Corbett for Mahan, Frazer for Dougherty, Dougherty for Connors, Sutliff for Corbett, Clark for Frazier. Lehigh—Scruggs for Early, Cahall for Maguinness, Sawtell for Chapman, Frank Green for Pons, Good for Hoban, Hoban for Halsted, Pons for Maguinness. Referee—Mr. Keogh, University of Pennsylvania. Umpire—Mr. Crowley, Bowdoin. Head linesman—Mr. Baldwin, Dartmouth. Linesmen—Mr. Donohue, Villanova; Mr. Scruggs, Lehigh. Two ten and two twelve minute periods.

Yale Youngsters Win, 35 to 6.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW HAVEN, Conn., Nov. 14.—In a ripping game of football today the Yale freshmen beat the Harvard freshmen, 35 to 6, after being completely outclassed in the first period, when two field goals by Robinson, with no score for Yale, made the Crimson youngsters look like the best team. A come-back which would have been worthy of the 'Varsity, however, completely smothered Harvard in the three other periods of the fray, and the touchdowns were piled up in rapid succession by the Yale Cubs. In the second period "Tom" Enwright, the Captain of the Harvard team, who had been playing a terrific game for his side, was knocked unconscious in a scrimmage and was carried from the field with a slight concussion of the brain. Later he was carried to the Yale clubhouse, where he recovered consciousness. When he found out where he was, the big full back made a dash for the door and wanted to get in the game again. He was taken to Cambridge in a private car tonight, and his physicians stated that he probably would fully recover. Line-up:

Yale.	Position.	Harvard.
Wylie	Centre	Wiggin
McGrath	Right guard	Snow
Saidings	Right tackle	Mackie

Umpire—Davis, Wesleyan. Linesman—Hatch, University of Pennsylvania. Time of quarters—Fifteen minutes.

One-Legged Football Star.

One-legged swimmers, baseball players, and runners have frequently made their marks in the field of athletics, but the latest to come into prominence is a Captain of a football team, who through some accident lost one of his legs. The Athletics, a strong independent football team of Alliance, Ohio, claims the distinction of having as its Captain this a one-legged player. Virgil Oswalt is the crippled star's name, and he is the mainstay of the team, which is one of the fastest semi-professional aggregations in the State. In the last three games played by his team Oswalt has by his fine individual work and wonderful handling of the forward pass brought his team from behind and won a victory in each instance.

DARTMOUTH ROUTS PENN.

Red and Blue No Match for New Hampshire Eleven.

PHILADELPHIA, Nov. 14.—The Dartmouth football team defeated Pennsylvania today 41 to 0, the highest score ever registered against a Red and Blue team on Franklin Field. Pennsylvania was outplayed in every department of play. Although Dartmouth did not score until the second period, the Green's goal was never in danger, the play being in Pennsylvania territory throughout the entire game.

Dartmouth used a fake pass successfully for many gains, while forward passes resulted in several touchdowns. The second-string men on the Green team were used freely during the closing periods, and performed as brilliantly as the veterans of the first squad. Comisky, who substituted for Ghee, making several startling runs, and scoring one touchdown on a fake pass, while Thielsher bucked the line for five yards and a touchdown within a few seconds after he had relieved Murdock at right half back.

Pennsylvania showed to the best advantage in the first half, when the Red and Blue held the big Green team for downs when only five yards were needed for a touchdown. Tucker then threw two successful forward passes for short gains, and the ball was on Pennsylvania's twenty-yard line when time for the first period was called.

Murdock scored Dartmouth's first touchdown on a succession of line plunges after Curtis had intercepted a forward pass on Pennsylvania's yard line. Winship scored the second on a forward pass, which he caught behind the goal line. The third touchdown was made on a line plunge by Murdock after a sensational run by Ghee. Gerrish made the fourth touchdown on a forward pass.

Line-up and summary:

Pennsylvania.	Position.	Dartmouth.

Lafayette's Victory 42 to 6.

EASTON, Penn., Nov. 14.—Lafayette very decisively defeated the Albright team on March Field this afternoon by the score of 42 to 6. The relative strength of the teams were not, however, commensurate with that score. Lafayette had most of the breaks of luck. Albright would show a great flash of offensive strength and then lore all the advantage by a fumble. Lafayette made three touchdowns in the first period, and all of them were directly or indirectly due to fumbles by Albright players. It is not that Lafayette was not strong enough to defeat Albright, but without these misplays the scores would not have come so rapidly. Both teams were weak on the defense. As a result there were many long runs and successful forward passes, which made the game picturesque. The mainspring of the Albright strength was Benfer, the big full back and Captain of the team. He played the best field game of any man who has played against Lafayette this year. Not only was his offense a revelation, but he backed up his own line splendidly and tackled in the open field in a sure fashion. The line-up:

Albright.	Position.	Lafayette.

Wesleyan Wins on Drop Kick.

Special to The New York Times.

MIDDLETOWN, Conn., Nov. 14.—Wesleyan won from Trinity here this afternoon 3 to 0 on a drop kick from the thirty-yard line in the third quarter by Eustis, Trinity depended upon a more open game than did Wesleyan, but the latter team solved the Trinity offense and Wesleyan's heavier line gradually wore out the spirited offense of the visitors. Hallock saved the game for Wesleyan early in the third quarter, when he stopped Lambert on the Wesleyan five-yard line after a fifty-two-yard run by the latter through the Wesleyan team. Trinity also lost the ball on downs to Wesleyan in the first period, when the ball was six yards from the goal line.

Wesleyan's best chance for a touchdown came in the second quarter, when a forward pass of twenty-eight yards, Slocum to Bovard, took the ball to Trinity's eight-yard line. Here the ball was lost when an incomplete pass rolled over the goal line. Kenan was a strong line plunger and backed the line well in the secondary defense. Slocum gained consistently on end runs, while Castator and Cole were the principal ground gainers for Trinity, both of whom ran the ends well. The line-up:

Wesleyan.	Position.	Trinity.
Wilkinson	Left tackle	Howell
Eustis	Centre	Kinney
Sargent	Right guard	Bradley
Gordon	Right tackle	Lambert

St. Paul's Closes with Victory.

St. Paul's School of Garden City closed its season yesterday with a 35-to-7 victory over the Irving School. The St. Paul's eleven was easily the better team and met with little opposition. St. Paul's this car won three games, played three ties, and lost two contests. The line-up:

St. Paul's.	Position.	Irving School.

TIGERS' BRACE COMES TOO LATE

mêlée only to go smash up against a stone wall. Princeton behaved nobly under their goal posts. They repulsed the onrushing enemy bravely. Three times Yale hammered at Princeton's line with the ball on the 4-yard line. And three times they were held up short in their tracks. But Yale had recourse and Le Gore whipped the pigskin over the Tigers' heads toward the red head of Brann, which loomed up above the Tiger headgears. Red caught the ball and it was another touchdown.

Yale seemed tireless. When they were not wearing themselves out battering at the Tiger line, they were hurling the ball around in the air in the most careless fashion. It was a fine thing to watch. Ainsmith, Le Gore, Knowles, and Scovil seemed to revel in trying to see how much battering their carcases would stand without a break. Another march down the chalk-marked field and the Tiger goal was within reach.

The Princeton students hoped to give life to their fading allies with cheer and song, but cheer and song did not stop young Mr. Scovil from tearing through for Yale's third touchdown. Up to this time it had been Yale and only Yale. Princeton had failed to get a first down and Princeton's tackling was hopelessly weak. They couldn't hold onto the Yale runners. The Elis slipped out of their grasp as if they were greased. And now it is the fourth period.

Many of the Yale adherents can see nothing to it but the overwhelming Yale triumph, and they start to leave the big Stadium, and start for their automobiles. The Princeton cheering section would not acknowledge defeat. Their lusty cheers rolled across at Yale as loudly as ever, the Yale cheer leader grinned a grin of satisfaction and megaphoned up at the Yale cheers: "Come on, boys, give 'em good-night Princeton! They are dying on the other side."

Dying, were they? Not much. They stood up, every mother's son of them, young and old, and the melodious strains of Old Nassau floated across the field.

With this chant ringing in their ears the Tigers went into the final period of the game.

Moore and Dickerman went into the game fresh from the side lines. Glick also came in and played at quarter back. Princeton seemed to be suddenly inspired. Rip, smash, crash, the backs began to tear into the line of blue. The bulldog song of the Elis stopped. Silent Frank Hinkey walked nervously along the line of substitutes, talking under his breath.

Capt. Talbott, who had left the game all tired out, suddenly ripped the horse blanket from his shoulders and told Hinkey that he was going back into the game. Red Brann and Stillman, the two Yale ends who had been taken out of the game a short time before, were rushed to the battle front. The Princeton students cheered as if their voices would crack as the Blue line began to back away from the fury of the Princeton drive. Back they went, one chalk mark after another. Nearer and nearer the Yale goal line seemed the Princeton. Yale, furious at the sudden turn of the battle, plunged headlong into the Tiger backs. But Moore, Dickerman, and the indomitable Glick were too elusive for them. What Glick did today will be remembered a long time at Princeton. He was irresistible and would not say die. It was Glick 6 yards, and Dickerman 5 yards, and Moore 7 yards all the way down the long, hard road to Yale's goal. But Princeton did it once, and did it nobly. And then, when the terrible predicament of only three minutes to play hung over their heads, they went right back about the job bravely and made the march all over again.

Yale groaned with every plunge of the Tiger backs and Princeton cried forth shrieks of delight every time any Yale player was stretched out on the grass. Yale couldn't stop it. They were tired. Princeton was fighting with that spirit which only comes as a last resort, that inbred hope which comes to the man in the last ditch when he knows that defeat is inevitable, but still has a never-say-die spirit left to grind his teeth hard clench his fists, and take his beating without a whimper. That was Princeton all afternoon.

HOW THE GAME WAS PLAYED.

Following the Ball Over the Palmer Stadium Gridiron.

Special to The New York Times.

PRINCETON, N. J., Nov. 14.—After the invigorating screams of delight from the opposing cheering sections at the advent of the two teams, Harry LeGore, Yale's full back, poised the ball on a heap of dirt and when the referee blew his whistle LeGore's right foot sent the ball spinning to Tibbott, who was downed by Waldon on the Tiger's 35-yard line. Driggs and Ames, butting into the Blue line, got only a few yards and Driggs boomed a high punt to LeGore on Yale's 30-yard line. LeGore punted on the next down and Yale gained 25 yards on the exchange. Yale tried a lateral pass without hesitation, but it failed to gain. A Yale forward pass failed, LeGore's heave going over the goal line. Yale got a few yards on a double pass, LeGore to Ainsworth and a 5-yard penalty for holding gave Yale a first down. Knowles ploughed through for a good gain and the Tiger defense seemed weak. Ainsworth, snatching a lateral pass from LeGore, eluded the Tiger tacklers and raced up the field 30 yards before he was downed on Princeton's 30-yard line. Knowles tore through Princeton's forwards for 5 yards, but the next two attempts failed and LeGore attempted to kick a field goal from the 20-yard line, but the ball went wild.

From the 20-yard line Driggs kicked out of danger. LeGore sent the ball to Princeton's 30-yard line on the next kick and Ames ran it back to midfield. Yale then sprung a spectacular triple pass as a prelude to her first touchdown. Wilson shot the ball to LeGore, who, just as he was tackled, sent it to Ainsworth, who made a beautiful catch and raced down the east side of the gridiron 35 yards for a touchdown. LeGore failed to kick the goal.

In the second period Yale put the ball into play on the Tiger's 25-yard line and then Knowles ploughed through for a 10-yard gain. In a punting exchange, Yale had much the beter of it and the Blue gained about 20 yards when LeGore and Driggs exchanged a few kicks. Ainsworth and Knowles tore big holes in the Tiger line. Wilson also did his share in the Nassau destruction. Each team tried forward passes which failed. There was much kicking with LeGore having the better of the exchanges.

Yale had much the better of the going all through the period and the line smashing of Knowles and Ainsworth and LeGore made the Tiger line look ineffective. When Yale, by relentless line plunging, had the ball down on the four-yard line, Princeton took a brace and after Knowles and Wilson had hurled themselves into the line with no avail three times. LeGore ran back and hurled a forward pass at Red Brann. He was then behind the goal line and caught the pass neatly and made a touchdown. LeGore kicked an easy goal and the score was 14 to 0.

The Yale back field was tiring under the terrific hammering at the Tiger line, and Scovil was substituted for Wilson. On an exchange of punts LeGore booted a long kick to Princeton's 12-yard line, the ball bounding over Ames' head. Driggs punted out of danger, Ainsworth getting the ball on Princeton's 40-yard line. Scovil and Ainsworth got five yards through the Tiger line and on the next play a pretty lateral pass, Ainsworth to LeGore to Red Brann, netted the Blue thirty yards and brought the ball to Princeton's 20-yard line. Another double pass, Ainsworth to Scovil, gave the Blue eight more yards and then Scovil tore through the Tiger forwards to Princeton's 10-yard line. On the next plunge Wilson carried the ball to the 2-yard line and Scovil was pushed over for a touchdown. LeGore failed to kick the goal. Score: Yale, 19; Princeton, 0.

Yale, by relentless hammering at the Tiger line carried the ball well into Princeton's territory toward the end of the third period. Yale gained on the exchange of punts and after LeGore had punted out of bounds on Princeton's 10-yard line, "Buzz" Law, standing behind his own goal line, punted to the 35-yard line, where Scovil made a fair catch. From this mark Scovil tried a kick from placement, but the leather went wide of its mark.

On the first play in the fourth period Yale was penalized fifteen yards for offside play. Guernsey, who had taken LeGore's place, punted to Dickerman on Princeton's 23-yard line. At this point Capt. Talbott left the game. Jim Sheldon taking his place. On an exchange of punts it was Princeton's ball on her 35-yard line. Then Princeton woke up and began a steady march up the field. Terrific line plunging by "Billy" Moore and Dickerman pushed Yale's fast tiring team back yard by yard in an aggressive attack which would not be denied. "Billy" Moore's zig-zag dashes had the Elis greatly puzzled, and by steady rushing, the New York boy went over for a touchdown. Law kicked the goal. Score: Yale, 19; Princeton, 7.

Dickerman ran the next kick-off back to Princeton's 25-yard line and Law punted to Yale's 35-yard line. Guernsey returned the kick to Dickerman on Princeton's 30-yard line.

Princeton at once began a sustained march up the field which brought yells of joy from the Princeton cohorts. It was at this time that Glick began to show his true worth as a plunging half back. Aided by Dickerman and Moore, Glick swept the Elis off their feet in the most gruelling onslaught the Blue had encountered this season. One by one they left the chalk marks behind, until the Yale goal posts loomed up plainly before them. The long road to the Eli goal line was traversed in a march of glory. Before Yale knew it Princeton had the ball a foot from the final mark, and then the tireless Glick made one grand plunge for the Tigers' second touchdown. Law kicked the goal. Score: Yale, 19; Princeton, 14.

Railroad Carried Nearly 17,000 Persons to Yale-Princeton Game.

Twenty-three special trains carried nearly 17,000 football enthusiasts yesterday to the Yale-Princeton game from the Pennsylvania Terminal, Thirty-third Street and Seventh Avenue. The handling of the record crowd by the Pennsylvania Railroad was accomplished without the slightest congestion or confusion. Little attention was paid to the regular schedule, preference being given to the specials, which were sent off at twenty minute intervals.

There was no delay sending the special trains off on time. Owing to the number of tracks, the railroad officials were able to handle the crowd without any serious interference with the usual traffic. The last special train was scheduled to leave the terminal at 11 A. M., but after this had been dispatched about 500 belated holders of seats for the game gathered at the gates. The stationmaster made up another train, which started at 12:04 P. M. and reached Princeton in time for the game.

The interminable delays and difficulties which have followed past games at Princeton were missing on the return journey. There was no confusion when the people made the usual rush for the trains after the game. Owing to the new spur tracks, it was possible to hold practically all the trains in or near the yards, with the result that as soon as one was filled there was another ready, with no check of the stedy flow from the stadium. Explicit posted directions and a big array of competent train officials were of material assistance in bringing about the perfection of the arrangements.

About 22,000 persons were carried to the game in special trains. Of this number about 5,500 went from Philadelphia. The number of special trains that went into the little Jersey college town was forty, while one train was made up of private cars.

The Pennsylvania Station officials were somewhat disappointed with the [illegible] equipment [illegible] number of [illegible] terminal.

FORDHAM PLAYS VERMONT, 7 TO 7

Maroon Holds Heavy Line of Visitors—Wymard's Kick Leads to Mistake.

Fordham kept its home field record clean yesterday by playing a tie game with the University of Vermont. The score was 7—7 and gave rise to a misunderstanding, and many of the spectators left the field under the impression that Fordham had been beaten by a 7—6 score. The mistake was due to the narrow margin of Capt. Wymard's kick for goal from the touchdown made by Dunn. Referee L. O. Kirberger of Washington and Jefferson, ruled in favor of the Fordham leader.

The fact that Fordham was able to hold the heavy line of the visiting team was somewhat of a surprise in spite of the advantage of playing on Fordham Field, but the Maroon aggregation put up a sterling defense and held firm against the aggressive attacks of the New Englanders. Capt. Wymard kicked his fifteenth consecutive goal this season. The Fordham leader had been knocked out just before his successful kick and was forced to leave the game after making the next kick-off.

Both elevens made their scores in the third quarter. Fordham was the first to cross the goal line after Regan's run of forty yards through left tackle, brought the ball to the four-yard mark. With Vermont holding like a stonewall on the first three downs Fordham's chance of scoring looked hopeless, but Dunn wiggled across on the last attempt, and Capt. Wymard kicked the goal.

Vermont scored its touchdown in less than three minutes after the Maroon tally, when Vizner grabbed the kick-off and ran sixty-five yards through the whole Fordham team to his own eight-yard mark, where he was overtaken by Kane. After that the Green quarter back was the keystone of the game, making the touchdown on the second down by a squeeze through centre. Frank then kicked the goal that tied the game.

On the next kick-off Vizner started on another gallop for the goal line, but was stopped after going forty yards. Fordham alternated in the possession of the pigskin, but the trick plays which had scattered the Green eleven earlier in the game proved of no avail, the last period ending with Vermont holding the ball on Fordham's twelve-yard line.

Capt. Wymard was unconscious several minutes after being carried out of the game, but Dr. Spies announced that his injury was not serious. Sennein and Vizner together with De Mallo, the old Holy Cross centre, on the line, appeared to advantage for Vermont, while Dunn and Rice featured for the Maroon. Line-up and summary:

CROSS COUNTRY RACES---SIX-DAY RACE STARTS TONIGHT---GOLF SCORES---SOCCER RESULTS

I.-A. A. C. RUNNERS WIN CROSS-COUNTRY

A. J. Fogel Leads Junior Metropolitan Pack Over a Stiff Course.

Two surprising victories were accomplished in the annual junior metropolitan cross-country championship run at Van Cortlandt Park yesterday, when A. J. Fogel, an independent entrant, romped off with the title and the Irish-American A. C. team captured the club honors by the margin of two points from the Bronx Church House. Both victories upset calculations of athletic enthusiasts, but it was Fogel's singular success that was the real surprise of the contest. Only a mere lad, this youngster proved too fleet of foot for one of the largest fields that ever competed in a metropolitan junior championship. Undaunted by the stiffest cross-country course in the United States, the Irish-American A. C. boy, weighing little more than 110 pounds, ran over the six and an eighth mile course in the fast time of 34 minutes 11 seconds.

Nick Gianacopulos, the heavy Greek runner of the Millrose A. A., up to the last minute an overwhelming favorite for the individual laurels, gave Fogel a stern chase over half the distance, but when it came to the final test of pure grit and stamina the Greek was found wanting. On even terms with the winner passing the starting point on the first lap around, the Greek fell behind yard after yard as stiff hills and dales were passed, and at the finish he was 150 yards behind his diminutive opponent.

Hugh Honahan of the New York A. C., another individual entry, was in the running through and finished third, fifty yards behind Gianacopulos.

The fact that six individual entrants finished among the first seven weighed heavily in the Irish-American team's favor. Despite the fact that Fogel's victory counted for naught in the Winged Fistites' team triumph, Frank Zuna brought first place to the squad by finishing fourth, ahead of C. De Stefano of the Ozanam A. A., O. Laaska, Kaleva A. A., and H. Ackerman of the New York A. A., all individual starters. The other four Irish-American A. C. representatives to count in the success are I. Messer, J. Gaffney, W. Fogel, a brother of the winner, and Willie Garvin.

Half a dozen athletic-looking youths carried the colors of Columbia University in the contest, lending added zest to the race, but they were outclassed by three club teams, and finished fourth. The Irish club had the low score of 40 points, Bronx Church was next with 42, Mohawks third with 62, Columbia fourth with 121, Long Island A. C. fifth with 135, Yonkers Y. M. C. A. sixth with 155, and Holy Family Lyceum brought up the rear with 164.

One of the features of the race was the fact that every one of the seven clubs which started the required number of men finished a complete team. Out of the sixty-six athletes who faced Starter John McHugh, fifty-four completed the journey.

For the first time in many years real cross-country running was had over the Van Cortlandt course. It was not play for even the best to tackle the numerous steep climbs and hollow declines which comprise the route. Even the strong fell by the wayside. It was because of his giant stature that Gianacopulos was considered a likely winner of the race, but it takes more than strength to win a race of yesterday's calibre. Fogel won because of his courage. On the first circuit he appeared tired. His legs lagged and he breathed heavily, but on his second trip he recuperated wonderfully, and at the finish could have gone away without trouble. He was aware he had the race well in hand a mile from the finish, and instead of running himself into the ground he took things easy and his victory was as effective as could be desired.

An added handicap in the way of the leg-weary runners was a water jump, three-quarters of a mile from the finish, which proved a big obstacle. Now and then a boy was unable to take the jump, and plunged face first into the water. On the first trip Russell Springsteen of the Yonkers Y. M. C. A., who later dropped out after receiving a severe fall, led the way to the mire, and with Gianacopulos and Fogel following, went over it safely. Not so with those who followed, for a log, which proved a stepping stone for the first trio, proved equally as big a handicap with their trailers, for it became slippery and made uncertain footing.

A prettier race was never witnessed than during the first three miles of the chase. Gianacopulos and Fogel fought it out over an entire lap, with the Irish representative showing the way, passing the judges in the splendid time of 16¾:4 4-5. On the climb to the golf links the second time round Fogel made his biggest gain on Gianacopulos, which he held despite frequent spurts on the part of the latter.

H. Crosby of the Bronx Church House might have brought victory to his team had he retained his first lap position on the last trip round the course. Passing the first water jump, he was eighteenth in the actual count, and when he finished he was third man from the last.

Two thousand persons gathered about the finish line, but through perfect police arrangements, which were handled by Inspector Walsh and Capt. McKeon, the homestretch was kept absolutely clear. An outstanding feature was the fact that the race started exactly at the scheduled time—3 o'clock. Summary:

Bullock being the runner-up with 46. Shooting from scratch in the shoot for the Accumulation Cup at 25 "birds," Granbery broke 23 straight, and in the scratch shoot at 15 "birds," he tied H. S. Y. M. H. A. Cross-Country Run.

All the divisions of the Metropolitan League Young Men's Hebrew Association have entered their cross-country teams in the invitation run of the Mount Vernon branch to be held on Thanksgiving morning, Nov. 26, starting at 10:30 o'clock, at Mt. Vernon, N. Y. The prizes to be awarded will be of the best. A silver cup 15 inches high will be given to the winner, and silver cups will also go to the second, third, fourth, and fifth men to finish, also to the first Mt. Vernon and Yonkers boy to finish. Mayor Fiske of Mt. Vernon, N. Y., will act as starter, and A. Shiman, President of the league, as referee. All information in regard to this run can be had of Ed Lindenbaum, Physical Director Mt. Vernon Young Men's Hebrew Association.

Montclair Beats B. M. I.

The Montclair Academy football team continued its winning streak yesterday by defeating the Bordentown Military Institute team at Bordentown, 7 to 0. Montclair used the same open style of play with which she has been so successful all season. Wide-open formations and fast end runs completely fooled the Bordentown team. Hazel and Manners tore off long runs for Montclair and hit the line for good gains. In the first half the teams battled to a no-score, but Montclair began to tear things up in the third period and worked the ball down to the 20-yard line, from where Hazel ran through for a touchdown. He also kicked the goal. The players of Hazel, Back; Scudder, and Segger were the features.

ROBERTSON LEADS SCHOOLBOYS IN RUN

Poor Work of Officials Spoils Columbia Cross-Country Race —Morris High Wins Trophy.

Absence of competent Amateur Athletic Union officials made the fourth annual Columbia interscholastic cross-country run one of the poorest managed athletic events of the season. Many Columbia University students acted as checkers, judges, and inspectors, and owing to their lack of knowledge of their duties, the announcement of the positions of the schoolboys at the finish caused considerable dissatisfaction.

Nearly 200 boys, representing 25 schools, started, but not more than one-third of that number were checked at the finish, and as a result, after nearly two hours' struggling with the complicated situation, only the first three boys to finish were announced.

The difficulty in selecting the winner of the Point Trophy was accomplished by eliminating the schools where no more than three or four boys were shown to have finished. This was manifestly unjust to institutions which would have figured prominently in the point score had the officials been competent. After the conference following the games Gustavus T. Kirby announced Alvin Robertson of Evander Childs High School as the individual winner of the run, and Morris High School as the successful school for the team prize. The former's time for the course, about three and a half miles, was 21:23, and Morris High's total was announced as 95.

Gustavus T. Kirby, the donor of the trophy, made a mistake in trying to fill every official position. He was the referee, fired the gun that started the 200 boys on their journey, acted as chief checker, and in the end filled the roll of announcer. When the boys were stripped ready for the race he marshaled them into one of the university halls and gave them a twenty-minute lecture on honesty in competition, supplementing this with another five-minute talk when the youngsters were on the starting line. As a result there was more than an hour's delay in starting the race, while it was dark before the winner was announced, making a total of three and a half hours to complete a run that actually required 21 minutes 23 seconds to negotiate.

J. Keoughan, Captain of the Watervliet High School, and Charles Boughton of the Central High School were protested before the race, and Referee Kirby declared them to be "scholastic ineligibles." Both charges were technical ones, but Keoughan took part in the run despite the official ruling and finished third. He was disqualified at the finish.

The course, which was approximately three and a half miles, was from South Field down 116th Street, east to Morningside Avenue, north to 122d Street, west to Riverside Drive, north to 125th Street, around Grant's Tomb, south to Ninety-seventh Street, returning by way of Riverside Drive to 116th Street, to South Field.

There was plenty of crowding and struggling at the start, but by the time the leaders reached 116th Street and Morningside Avenue the field was well strung out, with George Maier, Schenectady High School, in front. He was closely followed by J. H. Driscoll, Stevens School; M. Cook, E. Garivek and J. Davis, all of the Bloomfield High School.

When the runners reached 127th Street and Broadway, R. S. Reid, Mercersburg, had gone into the lead with his schoolmate, A. W. Schunk. There was little relative change in the position of the leaders until Riverside Drive and 100th Street was reached, when the big field was strung out for a distance of seven blocks with D. Menmott, Erasmus Hall, well to the front. He was followed in order by Reid, Schunk and William Smith, Erasmus Hall. Keoughan pulled up until the hill leading to 116th Street was reached, when he dropped back and the Mercersburg pair again took up the running.

At this point Robertson, who was running well within himself, made his sprint, and, passing the leaders, entered South Field with a margin of 10 yards, which he maintained to the finish line. Schunk was second and Keoughan third. The latter was disqualified and Reid placed next to Schunk. The order of finish of the leaders:

No.	Name and School.	Time. M. S.

MAINE RUNNERS BEST.

Capture New England Cross-Country Championship.

BOSTON, Nov. 14.—University of Maine won the New England intercollegiate cross-country championship over a course of 4.8 miles in Franklin Park, with a total of 66 points, today. F. C. Preti of Maine was the first runner to finish. His time was 25:15 3-5. The other team points were: Massachusetts Institute of Technology, 69; Dartmouth, 74; Massachusetts Agricultural College, 115; Williams, 136; Colby, 145; Brown, 146; Worcester Polytechnic Institute, 155; Amherst, 218. Weather and course conditions were ideal.

Preti was in the lead from the start, although hard pressed at the fourth mile by Brown of Technology. With the finish in sight, Preti sprinted. Brown could not hold the pace, and he was passed by seven other runners. A. C. Shriver of Williams finished second, in 25:37. R. W. Bell of Maine was third, in 25:38. Maine won the event last year.

Change in Style of Billiards.

By general agreement among the players in the Champion Billiard Players' League, the style of game has been changed from the 14.1 to the 18.2 game, as the latter is the more popular with spectators, as well as with the players. The contestants have found the 14.1 game too difficult over the strange tables on which they have to play in traveling the wide circuit, which extends from Boston in the East to Oklahoma in the West, with the inevitable climatic changes which make tables and balls erratic. George Sutton still leads the players, with a record of 31 games won and 3 lost, Morningstar being next, with 27 victories and 4 defeats. Sutton playing against Schaefer and Morningstar against Cochran, both made a clean sweep of victories during the last week Demarest's record is 24 games won and 3 lost. Cline's 18 and 13, Yamada's 13 and 18, Cutler's 8 and 24, Cochran's 4 and 27, and Schaefer's 3 and 11. The attendance at the games played during the last five weeks aggregated 3,000, which calls to all the more for the last circuits.

CAT SHOW FOR CHARITY.

Bide-a-Wee Home to Get Proceeds of Waldorf Exhibition.

Cats will dominate at the Waldorf-Astoria on Tuesday and Wednesday of this week. The Atlantic Cat Club will then give its annual championship show, and all the best cats in this vicinity will be there to compete for the honors.

For the first time in the history of American cat shows this display of the pets of womankind will be for charity, the charity to be benefited, thanks to the generosity of the managers of the Atlantic Cat Club, will be the Bide-a-Wee Home for Friendless Animals. Financial stringency has been knocking at the door of the home for admission, along with a lot of deserted pets, and the women have been at their wits' end to provide ways and means for keeping open their home for friendless cats and dogs on the Merrick Road on Long Island. They therefore appeal to all lovers of cats and dogs for liberal patronage for this show, which, as the entire proceeds will go into Bide-a-Wee's treasury, will help to fill a gaping void that has even threatened the continuance of this charity.

Entries for the show have come in in such abundance as to promise that this will be the best show the club has ever held. Catteries from all over the country will compete for the honors to be gained at the show, and there will be a large representation of pets, the property of private owners. So there will be something worth seeing as well as the knowledge that the attendants are benefiting a deserving charity to commend the show to the general public. Angoras, Chinchillas, Persians, Siamese, Australian, and the ordinary tabby are provided for in the list of prizes, and the competition for the ribbons promises to be hotter than ever. Whites, blacks, blues, tortoise shell, Maltese, and other colors will make a variegated exhibit of furry pets such as New York has never before seen.

HARNESS HORSE RACING.

Plans to Revive Sport at Empire City and Goshen Tracks.

A number of light harness racing men are interesting themselves in an attempt to revive that sport on the grounds of the Empire City track, near Yonkers, where a thoroughbred meeting is held yearly under the management of James Butler, who owns the property, but leases it to the Greater New York Fair corporation, which owns a grand circuit franchise, though it did not exercise it last year. There are both mile and half-mile tracks within the inclosure, and it has been suggested that the promoters of the fair enterprise, which has not been a success, unite with the men who belong to the Driving Club of New York for joint use of the track.

The scheme is to have matinée races over the half-mile track every week, with one or two weeks of trotting and pacing races for the best horses in the country, immediately preceding the State Fair meeting at Syracuse, or at some date which will be convenient to the owners of racing stables. There is a well-appointed clubhouse on the grounds, and ample stable room for training stables which might wish to locate there. A meeting at which the whole matter will be thrashed out will be called soon after Jan. 1, when the plans of the promoters of the affair shall have taken more definite form.

Meantime men in and around Goshen, with John R. Townsend, W. A. Harriman, and Rensselaer Weston, the moving spirits, are talking of reconstructing the old mile track at Goshen, N. Y., with the idea of holding a meeting at that place, the Goshen Driving Club still retaining its Grand Circuit franchise, though it has not been used for years.

Cornell Harriers Favorites.

Out of a field of thirteen entrants, the Cornell cross-country team stands favorite for the intercollegiate championship, which will be run next Saturday morning at New Haven. The course covers the regulation six miles, with the percentage of grass and dirt about evenly divided, with a little less than a mile of gravel. An interesting map of the course has been issued showing the line of travel over it, the position of the checkers, and the condition of the ground. There is also a profile showing the elevations at every stage of the journey. Cornell was the winner a year ago and will defend her title this season against Brown, Colby, College of the City of New York, Columbia, Dartmouth, Harvard, M. I. T., Pennsylvania State, Pennsylvania, Princeton, Syracuse, and Yale. Gustavus T. Kirby of Columbia will act as referee, Romeyn Berry of Cornell as chief inspector, Eugene J. Gianinni of Yale as starter, Justice Bartow S. Weeks of the College of the City of New York as chief judge at the finish, and Everett Wendell of Harvard as timer.

Champion Swimmer Meehan Feasted

When Boston has a champion at any sort of sport it takes the old-fashioned neighborhood delight in making much of him. They have been very busy of late taking care of the Brazer individually and collectively since that run-in with the Athletics that for a moment they forgot George R. Meehan of the Brookline Swimming Club, who won the Battery-to-Sandy Hook swim last July, and made a record in doing it. They made it good on Wednesday evening, however, by giving him a dinner, with ex-Mayor Fitzgerald and a half dozen other Boston celebrities toasting and praising him a bit. His victory had happened a day or two ago. Then the diners gave him a gold watch, with a chain and charm and an inscription recounting what he had done "for the glory of Boston." Members of an outing club to which Meehan is also associated, gave him a diamond scarf pin and promised to finance him for a trip to England to swim the English Channel, when the war is ended and the mines removed.

Running with Richmond Hounds.

The Richmond County Hounds enjoyed a long run yesterday over Staten Island country, one part of which was burning woods, the result of a fire on Friday night. The riders and hounds got through this difficult part of the run successfully, although the heat in some places was enough to add an element of danger to the journey.

The meet was held at Norman Donald's residence at Dongan Hills. The hounds were thrown in at the Billows and ran strong through Strook's Meadows to Poor House Woods, where the first check occurred. They were again thrown in at Tipperary Corners, running through Moore's Field and Platt's Pasture to St. Andrew's Church, where they were again checked.

The scent lifted and the hounds were once more thrown in this time at Taylor's Orchard. The scent was keen and the hounds ran strong to La Tourette estate, and a second check came at Freshkills Vale. It was in this run that the hounds passed through the burning woods.

The final throw in of the hounds took place at Arden Woods. The journey home was fast and through the Tyson Fields and Clarendon Park, where the meet ended. Among the riders were Frank M. Patterson, M. F. H.; P. A. Hart, Miss Betty Stettinius, Master Edward R. Stettinius, Mrs. G. G. Schroeder, Miss Louise Donald, Mr. and Mrs. D. Provost Hamilton, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Hamilton, Mr. and Mrs. R. Monell, and Naustion Seaver.

Seres and Dupuy, French.

Five minutes after midnight tonight Dick Rudolph, who started the Boston Braves on their way to a world's championship last July with his pitching, will start off another world's championship event, when he fires the gun for the start of the twenty-second annual international six-day cycle race at Madison Square Garden.

On account of the war, which cancels the annual Paris and Berlin championship events, the race in the Garden will be the only continuous six-day event held this year, and for the first time will be the real world's championship battle.

Eighteen teams, the largest field that has ever started since the days of dual competition, will leave the mark at the flash of the gun, and sprint and grind for 142 consecutive hours. Many countries in the world, and many nationalities are represented in the line-up.

Almost $40,000 will be distributed among the riders in prizes and bonuses during the six days that they are in procession, and while the athletic caravan moves along the white boardway it is estimated that more than 100,000 people will watch the contestants from Sunday night to the following Saturday.

The race marks the change of Harry Kaiser, Willie Hanley, and Gus Wohlrab, from the amateur field, where they have carried off the highest honors in the past season, to professional ranks, and Jimmy Moran, the Boston veteran of years, has announced that he would retire from the sport for all time after this contest, whether he finished first or in the ruck.

As a favorite for years, Moran's passing will touch many of the old sporting fans of the metropolis deeply. His sensational sprints, in some of the most spectacular races that have been run in the Garden, have made him very popular with the fans, and many of the messenger boys and newsboys have carried a picture of Jimmy Moran in his hatband during many a race rooting for the Boston Irishman.

In this grind Moran is teamed with Reggie McNamara of Australia, and the two riders are among those favored for first position with the new style of finish. While neither of them is as fast as Goullet or Clarke, their combined sprinting powers are more than equal to that of any team.

France will be represented by George Parent and Emile Cousseau and Georges Seres and Marcel Dupuy, a quartet that has shown wonderful form in practice on the Newark Velodrome and the Garden track. The set looks like the strongest that has ever been in a race here, and if a foreign aggregation has ever had a chance to capture the stake it appears as though this is the opportunity.

The final decision of the contest will be by a sprint every fifteen laps during the last hour, instead of the old one-mile dash that has chosen the big end of the money. This rule was instituted [illegible] refusing to ride on the old style.

Favorites for the battle are Jackie Clark and Eddie Root, a pair that has been in the running for years, and Alf Goullet and Alf Grenda, Australians who are in the best form of their career. Goullet was on the winning team with Joe Fogler of Brooklyn last year, and under the old order of things would probably be the stellar feature in a victory for his team with the one-mile dash, but under these rules the race looks like anybody's battle until the last lap.

Joe Fogler is paired with Fred Hill of Boston and on form should be in the running every foot of the way. This team appears to have as good a chance as any with the new style finish; in fact, the combined qualities of the team, which are necessary for a victory at this new game, upset the figures of the closest students of the game, because it is the first time that most of the Australians, Italian, Swiss, and American stars have ever competed under this style, and the performances in previous battles cannot be taken as a criterion.

BICYCLE WEEK STARTS.

Sprint Racing Opens Madison Square Garden's Annual Carnival.

As an appetizer for the crowd which will attend the six-day bicycle race opening tonight there were some championship short-distance events held last night in Madison Square Garden. Long before the doors were open there were long double lines of spectators waiting to be admitted, and before the first race was called the Garden was packed from dome to arena. An innovation in the way of women ushers evidently had a refining influence upon a large element of the spectators, who make the Garden their habit during the week, and there was a noticeable absence of the usual disquieting cat-calls and other heart-rending noises with which the bike fan appears to be a master. The feature of the programme was the international match team race, in which America, represented by Jackie Clarke and Joseph Fogler, two Garden favorites, defeated teams representing Italy and Australia. Fred Taylor took both the events for the amateurs. The summary:

First Event.—Four-Lap Handicap for Amateurs—First prize, $25; second prize, $15; third prize, $10; fourth prize, $5; first two men in each heat to qualify for final. First heat—Won by Harry Kaiser, New York, (scratch;) Fred Wallock, Newark, (15 yards,) second. Time—0:47. Second heat—Won by George Bowker, Glencoe A. C., (50 yards;) Thomas Smith, N. Y. A. Imports a Brussels Griffon Dog.

Mrs. William Caner Wiederseim, President of the American Pomeranian Club, has received from England her new purchase, Castle Haven Money Spender, which, in spite of its long name, is a small and young dog of the Brussels griffon breed. It has the reputation of being the finest dog of its breed ever shipped out of England. Mrs. Wiederseim is said to have been the first owner of a dog of this breed in America, though she abandoned it as a special pet in favor of the Pomeranian a few years ago. She has gone back to her first love in order to help increase the interest in the show of this species, as they make ideal watch dogs.

ENGLISH SOCCER RESULTS.

Sheffield Defeats Manchester City in Principal Contest 2 to 1.

LONDON, Nov. 14.—The star attraction in the first division of the English Football Association League games today was played at Sheffield between the Wednesday Club and Manchester City, who have been running neck and neck for top place for weeks past. The latter's unbeaten record was seriously threatened and a big effort was needed to keep it intact. Both sets of players were in fine form and with the scores level at half time Manchester City played desperately for the lead, but the Sheffield team, scoring just on time, gave the Manchester Club their first defeat this season by 2 to 1 after an exciting game, causing them

UMPIRE EVANS'S BASEBALL GOSSIP---SOME NOVELTIES FOR THE GARDEN HORSE SHOW

HOW BRAVES UPSET BASEBALL 'DOPE'

Other Instances of Experts Picking Winners That Failed.

By BILLY EVANS.
American League Umpire.

It was at the close of the final game of the American League season. I was in my dressing room at Shibe Park, packing up preparatory to taking the first train to New York, where I had been assigned to work the series between the Giants and the Yankees. George Hildebrand, who worked the final game with me, and who was to officiate in the big series, which opened at Philly, was helping me to make a hurried getaway.

"Confidentially, what do you think of the big series?" asked Hildebrand.

"Well, George, a lot of people have asked me that question, and I have told them all they probably knew more about it than I did, but I'm going to tell you just exactly what I think. I believe it will be an easy series for you. It won't go over six games, in all probability five may be enough, and I wouldn't be surprised if the Athletics took four straight."

That was just what I thought of the 1914 series. I knew Boston was a good ball team, but I honestly thought the Athletics were so much better, that there was nothing to it but Connie Mack's team when picking the winner. Prior to the start of the New York series I talked with a number of the Giants; every New York player I talked with relative to the big event, picked the Athletics to win. "The Athletics will find it easier to beat the Braves than they did us," was the way the members of McGraw's team put it. I went even farther in my confidential chat with Hildebrand. "Bender is one fellow who will beat the Braves," I told my umpire partner, "for the Indian never looked better than in the last game he faced New York." I referred to a three-inning work-out Bender had against the New York Americans. In three innings Bender struck out five men.

My brand of dope on the big series couldn't have been much worse. No Athletic pitcher was hit harder than the crafty Indian. Manager McGraw was about the only member of the Giants who had much respect for Boston, and he couched his opinion of Stallings's team in a rather funny way.

"When you watch the club practice," said McGraw, "you can't see much class to it, but before the game is over, their aggressive tactics make you think they are trying to drive you off your own ball field."

An aggressive spirit that refused to be denied made the Braves a team that didn't know when it was beaten. As a result it outgamed the opposition in many a contest, which at one stage of the game semed hopelessly lost as far as Boston was concerned.

Tim Hurst handed out the best information possible to give, when some one asked him relative to the winner of a ball game.

"I rather think it will be the team that makes the most runs," was as definite an expression as it was possible to pry out of Sir Timothy.

The series between the two New York teams furnished another excellent example of how little one can figure on the dope in baseball. Prior to the start of the series I was discussing the Giants with one of the National League umpires who was to officiate in the series. "The Giants are not going as they should, and the Yankees may make a lot of trouble for them," remarked the National Leaguer. "The club hasn't been hitting and the pitchers are in a slump. Mathewson isn't right, and most of the other fellows, with the exception of Tesreau, appear off form. Tesreau never looked better in his life, his control is great, and he is one pitcher who is certain to beat the Yankees."

A goodly part of the opinion turned out correctly, but the one best bet didn't go over. The series lasted five games, two of the contests being extra inning affairs, but Tesreau, the man picked to beat the Yankees, was the only pitcher who failed to score a win over the American Leaguers. Jack Warhop opposed the "Ozark Giant" in the second game of the series and beat Tesreau 2 to 1. Strangely enough, his much-touted control, or rather lack of it, caused his defeat. In the ninth inning a hit, an error, and two bases on balls, the last one forcing in the winning run, netted the Yankees two runs, enough to win.

Near the close of the American League season Connie Mack decided to give his regulars a rest, as his team had the pennant cinched. Four games remained on the schedule with the Washington team, two in that city and the other two in Philly. The team Mack sent against Washington in those four games was probably the strangest collection of players that ever represented a big league city. An outfielder played third base, a pitcher worked in the outfield, a regular did the catching, but the rest of the players were either substitutes or bush leaguers picked for the occasion. The Washington Club, one of the strongest teams in the American League, appeared to have a cinch in this series. Looking over the two teams, there didn't appear to be a chance for the Washingtonians to lose; the only question was how lop-sided the scores would be.

Detroit and Washington were fighting for third place at the time, and Manager Griffith undoubtedly hoped to clinch the position by taking four straight. I don't believe I will ever forget that series. The misfit aggregation wearing Philadelphia uniforms looked like the greatest team in the world, the regular team could not have hit more timely or fielded more sensationally. Imagine Manager Griffith's surprise, as well as his players', when they dropped two games. It was only by the hardest kind of work that they managed to take the next two and even up the series. Instead of being able to pinch the position by taking all four games Griffith was forced to battle up to the very finish to capture third place honors.

Reds Purchase Infielder Olson.

CINCINNATI, Ohio, Nov. 14.—August Herrmann, President of the Cincinnati National League Baseball Club, announced last night that he had signed Ivan Olson, an infielder, who played last year on the Cleveland American League team. Olson was recalled by the waiver route, but the purchase price was not given for publication.

PLAY AT POLO GROUNDS.

Rutgers' and W. and J. to Close Football Season on Nov. 28.

The football season in New York City will close at the Polo Grounds on Saturday, Nov. 28, when Rutgers will oppose the strong Washington and Jefferson team. The game has been hanging fire for some time, but yesterday the Washington and Jefferson folks agreed to play at the Polo Grounds, and in anticipation of the offer being accepted several of the Rutgers team made the trip yesterday to Wheeling, W. Va., to watch the game between W. and J. and the University of West Virginia.

The contest will bring together two of the strongest of the teams outside of the "Big Three." Rutgers has achieved such distinction on the gridiron this season that it is almost certain that the team will secure a later date against Princeton next year. The Rutgers team heretofore has been looked upon as good practice for the Tigers, but the New Brunswick players have developed such strength this season that they had the coaches worried at Princeton.

Of their regular schedule Rutgers has only two more games to play—Stevens Institute next Saturday and on Thanksgiving Day against New York on University Field. W. and J. is not scheduled to play on Saturday, but will face the strong Bucknell aggregation on Thanksgiving Day at Washington, Penn.

NEW WALKING RECORDS.

Contestants in 25-Mile Championship Make Fast Time.

Four American records were erased from the athletic records in the first 15 miles of the first 25-mile walking championship last night at the Twenty-second Regiment Armory, 168th Street and Broadway. The walkers did not make much headway against the best existing figures until the twelfth mile, when the time made by W. O'Keefe at Williamsburg, Dec. 31, 1880, was reduced by nearly two minutes. From this stage of the contest up to the fifteenth mile the intemediate records were broken. The time for fifteen miles was 2 hours, 11 minutes 38 seconds against O'Keefe's record of 2 hours 14 minutes 44 seconds.

Colgate Surprises Syracuse.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., Nov. 14.—A lightning attack, which included a brilliant repertoire of new football, enabled the Colgate University football team to hold Syracuse to a no-score tie here this afternoon. The battle was waged in midfield for the most part.

Colgate rushed the ball to the four-yard line just before time was called at the end of the first half. In the second period they brought the ball down to within the shadow of the Orange bars on a succession of forward passes.

The Syracuse team, which outweighed the victors by more than 18 pounds to the man, was totally lost against the dashing offense of the visitors. More than 15,000 persons witnessed the game. Line-up:

Horseman Hertz Back from Europe.

Emil Hertz, who had been racing a string of horses over the tracks in Continental Europe, has just returned from Europe, where he has been "a prisoner of war," as he puts it, ever since the outbreak of hostilities. When it seemed certain to him that there was to be a war he got all his horses together in France and managed to smuggle them out on the last steamer that brought livestock of that sort to this country. They have been racing in Kentucky in the name of their trainer, M. Kelly, while Hertz assumes to believe the authorities of both France and Germany have been trying to locate the animals in Europe, so as to commandeer some of them, at least, for war service. Hertz says: "Racing is dead in Europe for the next ten years, or practically so at least, for the general opinion seems to be that the war will last for a couple of years longer. After it is concluded people will have something besides racing to think of, and I am satisfied to cast my lot with the sport on this side of the water. If there is one thing more than another that the armies want at the present time it is horses, for the slaughter of the animals has been something terrific, and it will take at least ten years after the conclusion of peace for the breeders to get anything like a supply of stock even of the commonest kind. All the animals of value, young and strong enough to be of service in army operations, are now in use, and the thought of breeding is the one farthest from the mind of any horse breeder at the present moment."

Won Bout, but Lost Money on It.

NEWARK, Nov. 14.—The fate of a boxer winning from an opponent and still losing money is that of Young Gradwell, the local lightweight, who defeated Knockout Brown before the Olympic Club here Tuesday night. Gradwell tells the story that he lost $29 on the fight. He guaranteed Brown $350 for his part of the fight in making arrangements before the contest, so anxious was he to get Brown in the ring with him. Brown failed to attract the Newark fans, and the house receipts, of which Gradwell was to get 55 per cent., were only $397. Gradwell also paid $35 appearance money, and when the management had paid over the amount guaranteed to Brown, they returned only $6 to Gradwell. The latter claims the management still owe him $1.83. Neither the managers of the fight club nor Danny Morgan, who conducts the business for Knockout Brown, accorded Gradwell any sympathy, and he had to bear his loss, though he got credit for handing Brown a severe beating.

Vinona A. C. Ball in Tammany Hall.

The Vinona A. C. of Greenwich Village will hold its annual ball at Tammany Hall on next Wednesday evening. This club was organized in the old Greenwich Village school several years ago, but grew so rapidly it has several times been compelled to seek larger quarters, and is now comfortably housed in a three-story building on West Eleventh Street. The club specializes in athletics in all branches, its ball team having closed a very successful season. Its basket ball team for the last two seasons has a record second to none for its weight in Greater New York, while among the members are some excellent runners, both sprinters and long distance men, as well as clever amateur boxers, who will be heard from in the championship tournaments in this city this Winter.

Country Club and Golf News.

At the annual meeting of the Haworth Country Club Herbert O. Barnes was chosen President to succeed W. S. Cowie, who declined re-election. The selection of Barnes was unanimous. Berrien Walker and C. Bambach were chosen Vice Presidents. F. S. E. Gunnell and Frank H. Hennessey held over as members of the Board of Directors, new ones being chosen as follows:

Three years—L. B. Harrison, Berrien Walker, and J. B. W. Lansing; two years—J. A. Gwyn and C. Bambach; one year—H. C. Barnes and C. S. Hedges. C. A. Gordon, W. C. Bates, and W. S. Cowie also serve by executive appointment. Gunnell was elected Treasurer at a subsequent meeting of the Directors.

The President appointed the following committee Chairmen: Finance, C. A. Gordon; House, W. C. Bates; Grounds, W. S. Cowie; Tournament, C. S. Hedges; Membership, Philip Croxton; Handicap, J. M. Greenfield, Jr.; Publication, Herbert Riddell.

By defeating Arthur G. M. Staveley 2 up and 6 to play in the 36-hole final match, Hugh J. Dannelly won the championship of the Brooklyn-Forest Park Golf Club for the second year in succession. Staveley has been runner-up for three successive seasons.

BLACKSMITHS IN HORSE SHOW RING

Prizes for Window Displays—Fashion Parade and Military Hike Among Attractions.

The Charity Horse Show to be held in Madison Square Garden from December 7 to 12, in aid of the Red and White Cross war relief funds, will present a number of novelty attractions in addition to the regular Horse Show programme. There will be an exhibition of accessories in the annex which will include a display of the newest costumes for sport and society fixtures by a group of artistic and beautiful fashion models. There will be a parade of mannikins in the latest modes.

One of the interesting action tableaux will be that of eight contestants, furnished by John F. Fitzgibbon and Williams Slattery of the Journeymen Horseshoers' Union No. 1 of New York, competing in beating out a horseshoe from a redhot iron bar and fitting it and attaching it to a horse's hind foot. Each worker will have an assistant at his forge and anvil and there will be a leader for each of the eight horses. A musical society will render the "Anvil Chorus" during this tableau.

Another special contest of wide interest, entirely new to a New York City horse show, will be for a prize of $100, given by S. W. Taylor, for the best designed window suggestive of the Horse Show, displayed by a business house of Greater New York during Horse Show week. The competition is endorsed by the Fifth Avenue Merchants' Association and is expected to create a lively rivalry in window displays.

"Made in America" will be the motto of the Accessory Fashion Show, to quote the bulletin issued by G. Jason Waters, Chairman of the Charity Horse Show Committee. The idea is taken from the Olympia Show at London, where the display of riding and driving accessories has a prominent place. The New York exhibitors will utilize the concert hall annex. The habits, hats, carriage gowns, and wraps will be worn by beautiful and skillful mannikins, some of whom have reputations as artistes in effective costume displays won in the Parisian ateliers of dress designers and milliners now closed by the war. This group, especially two Belgian girls, are refugees to the extent that they have had to come to New York on account of the closing of the Paris shops. Riding habits will be worn both for the side and cross saddle style, and also the latest conceptions in feminine hunting and polo suits.

Major Wright of Squadron C and Major Debevoise of Squadron C, the cavalry regiments of the State National Guard having their headquarters in Greater New York, have pledged their support to the military endurance run on the opening day of the Horse Show, from Van Cortlandt Park to the Madison Square Garden show ring. Major Charles A. Benton, who will serve as starter and chief patrol judge of the mounted "hike," has measured a course of 12¾ miles. The start will be from the polo stables of Squadron A, in Van Cortlandt Park.

To the Harlem bridge at 145th Street and Lenox Avenue the route will be over the dirt road of the Concourse. The bridle road in Central Park will probably be used from the northern entrance, under a convoy of mounted park policemen, to Fifth Avenue and Fifty-ninth Street. From that point there will be an escort of the Mounted Traffic Squad down Fifth Avenue. An entry of fully twenty riders is expected, which will include several from the United States Army.

Four of the richest classes, in one the three divisions being of $200, $75, and $25 and in the three others of $100, $50, and $25, are for five-gaited saddle horses, and a representative entry is assured from the South, especially Kentucky and Missouri, where this American type reigns supreme under the fostering care of the National Saddle Horse Breeders' Association. It is the ideal mount for long rides, and was highly valued throughout the entire country before the advent of railroads, as each of the five gaits, the walk, trot, rack, canter, running walk, and fox trot, especially the latter, which is a slow pace, are restful and do not tire the rider on a journey as much as the three-gaited Northern and British hack. The Southern saddle horses are famous for beauty, too, and are invariably used with long tails.

Several five-gaited horses have been shown in different years in the regular saddle horse classes at the National Horse Shows, notably by Gen. Castleman of Louisville, Ky., and in 1909 there was a prize of $150 for the type and also a cup presented by James T. Hyde. The winner was Edna May, owned by Mrs. R. T. Lowndes, Jr., but there has never been a full classification before at a Madison Square Garden show.

The sporting novelty of the class for the "Grafton Hunt Long Jump" is that the horses jump over white pasteboard boxes laid out like bricks. The fear every shy horse has for a bit of waste paper on the road, plus the nerve shock caused by the clatter of breaking one by its hoofs, causes the jumpers to strive to clear the obstacle without touching. Green hurdles, waterjumps, the "in and out," and even the artificial stone walls have no fears for the seasoned show hunters and jumpers, but it is different over pasteboard boxes. On this account, from the cleverness of the jumping and the opportunity for exact measurements of each trial, the "Grafton" has been a great success at the home horse show. Harry W. Smith, M. F. H., is the inventor.

DAVIS CUP TENNIS.

National Association to Decide Whether to Challenge Next Year.

The propriety of challenging for the Davis Cup has received careful consideration during the past two months by the officials and the Executive Committee of the United States National Lawn Tennis Association. After giving due deliberation to the influence which the war in Europe may have upon international sport next year, it has been decided to submit to the delegates at the annual meeting at the Waldorf-Astoria in February the proposition to formally challenge the Australasian holders of the cup. Such an action is believed to be thoroughly within the ethics of the highest standard of sportsmanship and it is believed that the delegates from all over the country will approve of the challenge when they understand the conditions.

HOCKEY CLUBS AT PEACE.

No Friction in League This Season—Drafting Schedule.

Followers of hockey are wondering how long the hatchet is going to be buried. There was not a cloud on the horizon when the American Amateur League held its meeting on Thursday night at St. Nicholas Rink. In fact, it has been years since the delegates have been so unanimous in their ideas.

The fact that the Boston Athletic Association was anxious to join was the principal thing that bound the interests together. Both the management of the rink and the delegates of the various clubs believe that by admitting the Boston club it will help the sport wonderfully, and all are willing to give and take to make the move possible.

A schedule committee, consisting of R. L. von Bernuth, St. Nicholas; William Dobby, Crescent A. C.; Louis de Casanova, Hockey Club, and James O'Brien, Irish-American A. C., is now selecting the dates. The fact that many of the games will have to be played on a Saturday night makes the task a difficult one.

The New York Athletic Club will not put a team on the ice this Winter. At the recent meeting the Irish-American A. C. of Boston, the Harvard Club of Boston, the Scarsdale Hockey Club, and the New Rochelle Hockey Club were all rejected by the league on account of the impossibility of arranging a suitable schedule.

Several amendments were made in the constitution. The most important was the advancing of the date of the annual meeting to the second Thursday in October. J. O'Brien, Irish-American, and Ralph A. Winsor, Boston A. A., were added to the Executive Committee. The Governing Committee is made up of William Russell, George Hallock, and Ralph Winsor. Although no definite steps were taken, every indication points to seven-men teams this Winter. The six-men game was found to be a failure last season.

There will be a meeting of the Hockey Club of New York on Monday night. It expects to have a good team this Winter. It is said that Castleman will play again.

"Tod" Brown has been elected Captain of the hockey team of the Crescent Athletic Club. George Hallock will be the manager. The Bay Ridge aggregation does not expect to be as strong this year as last, as its team has been all shot to pieces. Both Dr. Mills and Cox have resigned from the club.

AUTO DRIVERS AT FRONT.

French Pilots, Cheerful Under Fire, Write of Their Experiences.

INDIANAPOLIS, Nov. 14.—Race drivers in the European war are playing the game with the same courageous optimism that characterized their recent successful invasion of the 500-mile Indianapolis Sweepstakes, letters received here from the front would seem to indicate. Some of them are even making plans for the next Hoosier contest.

Goux, winner of the 1913 500-mile race, thus writes C. G. Fisher, President of the Indianapolis Motor Speedway, as follows: "I am in very fine spirits after two months of war, and find the service very interesting. Since the start of the campaign we have taken advantage of the bandits of Germany and now occupy a part of Alsace, and our offensive advances all the time. Unfortunately, the war may last a long time. Should, however, I be able to get away before the 30th of May, I shall certainly do so."

In the same mail Goux wrote Johnnie Aitken, his erstwhile Yankee pit manager, that he was in fine shape, and wanted to bet France would win, but had no Dan Smiths (Indianapolis betting commissioners) to take any of his money.

André Boillot, brother of Georges Boillot, who was favorite for the last Hoosier contest until put out by a broken frame in the 140th lap, is prone to take an even more carefree view of the situation. He writes Aitken, whom he met in Paris before the war, as follows:

"Georges is still affected to Gen. Joffre, and I do exactly the same. We met one each other after two months of war, and are still together. I hope to keep so till the end of the war. We are never on the front, but we go to see it sometimes."

That the race drivers are not completely free of danger, however, is shown by further excerpts from Boillot's letter, as follows: "Soon I will write how Georges escaped once from the shell; how Rigal and Farous (the latter accompanied Goux to America the year he won the 500-mile race) have great danger but great sport in same time. Goux is in good health at Belfort on the east frontier. Soon we all return perhaps. Better prepare the supper for next winning in the Indianapolis Grand Prix."

Horsemen Going to New Orleans.

According to Judge Joseph A. Murphy, who is interested in the horse race meeting at New Orleans which starts on Jan. 1, more than forty horsemen have promised to ship their horses to the Crescent City. There will be no stake races at the new meeting, which is scheduled to run forty days, but a number of high-class overnight handicaps with $2,200 offered as purses each day.

'MIKE' DONOVAN RECEIVES AT N.Y.A.C.

Club Members Give Veteran Benefit Which Nets Their Old Instructor $7,000.

When the New York Athletic Club took possession of its new clubhouse at the corner of Fifty-fifth Street and Sixth Avenue, "Professor" Mike Donovan began his service as professional instructor of boxing for the members. That was in 1885, and ever since then Mr. Donovan has held the position. The then dark hair and mustache have become gray, limber muscles and active feet have lost some of their limberness and activity, and with the coming of the new year Donovan will retire from his active duties as an instructor to accept a position as "professor emeritus," leaving the active work of instruction to younger men under the sage advice of "the old head," who has taught something like 5,000 members of the club the rudiments and in some cases the refinements of the boxing game.

As a testimonial to the loyal and faithful service for so many years of this veteran of the ring, the members of the club arranged a reception, the entertainment feature of which were boxing exhibitions at the clubhouse last evening, in which Mike and his son were the star performers, naturally, the old man showing that he was still there with his ability to handle his fists and give and take punishment, and his son seemed to enjoy as heartily as did the assembled crowd the opportunity he had to get a crack at dad. There were resounding cheers when the veteran stepped into the ring, liberal applause when he did clever stopping and leading and boxing with his son, and a perfect ovation when W. H. Page, President of the club, handed to the retiring instructor an engrossed set of resolutions setting forth the esteem in which the club regarded him, and at the same time gave him seven $1,000 bills, the receipts from the benefit for their old instructor.

"Professor" Donovan was so embarrassed over the reception and overjoyed at the receipt of such a bountiful testimonial that he could hardly express his thanks, accompanied by his regrets at leaving the activities of a club that had come to be almost a home to him. There were tears in his voice, if not in his eyes, and the incident was one that will long be remembered in the history of the club.

Among those present in the throng of a thousand who wished the old instructor farewell and God-speed, and incidentally saw a lot of boxing exhibitions, were Mayor Mitchel and Water Commissioner Henry S. Thompson, Judge Henry A. Gildersleeve, Justice Bartow S. Weeks, F. A. Dugro, and Thomas F. Donnelly, ex-President Gen. Thomas L. Watson, A. V. de Goicouria, A. G. Mills, Richard H. Halstead, Fred R. Fortmeyer, George E. Ruppert, W. A. Bauman, M. T. Lynch, Peter C. Gallagher, James M. Motley, Irvin S. Cobb, Dr. J. N. West, Thomas F. Ryan, Thomas J. Regan, Dr. R. B. Kelly, Commodore Frederick G. Bourne, Simeon Ford, G. G. Stow, C. Walter Schultz, M. F. Loughman, George A. Sykes, H. E. Buermeyer, R. J. Schaefer, G. A. Tatum, Everet J. Wendell, H. H. Baxter, A. B. Fletcher, W. C. Heppenheimer, George Ehret, and James W. Hyde.

Boxers who gave exhibitions included the ex-champions Jack McAuliffe and Tommy Ryan and these among the active boxers at the present time: Mike Gibbons, Battling Levinsky, Gunboat Smith, Tom Gibbons, Leach Cross, Kid Lewis, Jack Britton, Young Otto, Eddie Morgan, Harry Thomas, Harry Stone, Al Reich, and Tom Kennedy. Snappy six-round bouts were indulged in, to put a zest to the show, by the lightweights Jack Clark and Jim Smith and the welterweights Eddie Nugent and Charles Murphy, all four boys doing clever work in the bouts in which they participated.

Worcester Lads Land Two Victories.

Special to The New York Times.

WORCESTER, Mass., Nov. 14.—Worcester Academy scored a double victory over its old rival, Williston, today by winning the annual football game, 71 to 0, and the cross-country run, 27 to 18. Williston at no time was dangerous, and was completely bewildered by the wonderful exhibition of forward passing and open field running of the Worcester boys. The work of Haas J. Robertson, Malone, Shaw, and Munyan excelled for Worcester, while that of Capt. Finlay was the best for Williston. In the cross-country run Crathern of Worcester defeated Shaw of Williston in a close finish. The next four to finish were Worcester men, who earned the team prize for the home runners.

Right and Wrong Views of Athletic Sports

Issued by the National Collegiate Athletic Association

Athletic sport, if honorably and wisely conducted, can hold its own in any institution of learning; but to gain a position of dignity it must be saved from many of its friends and maintained on so high a level that no reasonable man can question its value. Rightly administered, it strengthens the weak, improves the weak places in the strong, clears the brain, teaches boys and young men to respect their bodies, and to know the relation of a clean, vigorous body to an active mind and an honorable life. Rightly conducted, it is a school of manly skill, courage, honesty, self-control, and even of courtesy; wrongly conducted, it is a school of bad manners, vulgarity, tricky evasion, brutality—the ideals not of a sportsman but of a sporting man.

We are constantly told that in England men play for the sake of playing, whereas in America men play for the sake of winning. The more serious the question of winning, the more serious the need of winning honorably. Sport in America is not mere fun; it is a test of character, and nothing that makes the player less a gentleman belongs to it. The football player who wantonly injures his rivals, the baseball player who persists in shouting to rattle his opponents, the schoolboy or student who takes money for Summer baseball and conceals the fact should be put out of the team. Nor should any school or any college have secrets as to the legitimacy of its athletic representatives.

To maintain high ideals in athletic sport is the chief purpose of the National Collegiate Athletic Association. This association brings together representatives of more than one hundred universities and colleges in three meetings held on one day every year. Sometimes a group of colleges sends a joint representative; oftener a college sends a man of its own, or two or three men, of whom only one represents it officially. A number of schools and academies have associate membership. Committees working throughout the year prepare business for the meetings, when the delegates listen to addresses from men who know much about athletic sports, and reports from committees on the various athletic sports cultivated at college. The evening meeting is devoted to the discussion of vitally important questions in college athletics.

Though strictly the association has no power over the colleges it represents, it has unlimited opportunity of influence. Its discussions of athletics are the most important in America, and its opinions find expression in "Rules Committees" and in standards of athletic games throughout the country.

The association encourages "Faculty control of athletics," believing that the man in charge of physical education should be a member of the Faculty and as good a man as any in it; that he should have a thorough acquaintance with athletic sport and a strong sympathy with youth, knowing, and able to teach, the difference between cleverness and trickery, between manliness and brutality, between the amateur spirit and the professional, between the sportsman and the sporting man.

WATER POLO OUTLOOK.

Three Colleges Seem to be Evenly Matched in Available Members.

Captains of collegiate water polo teams have mustered most of the available material for the approaching season, and a canvass of the various squads indicates that prospects are excellent for a close and interesting fight in the tournament which will award the championship pennant of the Intercollegiate League.

Judging on past performances Princeton, Yale, Columbia, and Pennsylvania appear very evenly matched, and experts believe the City College of New York may also be in the running, for the recent changes made in the rules promise to place a premium on speed and skill, instead of giving the advantage to the stronger and heavier players.

While Princeton has retained only two of the men who helped to win titular honors last year—Capt. Selby and Scudder—it should not be difficult for Frank Sullivan, the coach, to fill the vacancies. Rutherford, Gennert, Latrobe, Kahn, Bloom, King, Reynolds, and Battles are all experienced players. Some of them were on the reserve list in 1913 and 1914, others saw service on the freshman teams which more than once defeated the Varsity contingent in practice.

Yale will line up practically the same group that gave the Tigers a splendid battle last Winter, unless better candidates are developed, which is unlikely. Only Braden, the star goal tender, has been graduated. Capt. Steiner, McLeish, Van Holt, Mayer, and Smith are again on hand, and there are a number of good recruits trying for positions. Leaders among them at present are Kent, Keyes, Wooley, Ferguson, and Rosener.

At Columbia there is a wealth of championship timber, but it needs welding together. Capt. Mouquin, Rogers, Cleveland, Wensley, Altenberg, Neff, Canavan and one or two others are individually the equals of their best rivals, and if they only support each other in both offense and defense, developing the brand of team work exhibited by Princeton and Yale, there is no doubt that they will be very hard to beat.

And the same may be said about the Pennsylvania contingent. Capt. Shryock, Ratner, Swan, Shrenck, Kelser, Heraty, Neely, and Russell have shown flashes of brilliant work in past games, but they failed to win because lack of co-operation prevented their taking advantage of opportunities made. This season George Kistler will be assisted in the coaching by H. K. Marcy, one of the all-college players of 1914, and the latter will devote his energies chiefly to making a unit of the team, so things may be different.

City College poloists are rather scarce, and so far a scant half dozen have shown Varsity standard—Baber, Rudensky, Trainor, Wyckoff, Scalata, and Brown. Coach Lionel Mackenzie, however, is confident that the revised code will encourage several speedy swimmers thought too light for the game to join the squad, and he thinks a team strong enough to give a good account of itself can be turned out before the deciding matches are played.

The championship tournament, in which each college will face every other in the league, will open early in December, and continue throughout January and February.

DEVELOPING SWIMMERS.

New System to be Tried This Season at New York A. C.

An interesting experiment, which may be profitable to swimmers throughout the country, will be conducted this season at the New York Athletic Club. It is the plan of those in charge of the Mercury Foot aquatic squad to encourage sprinting practice among all classes of contestants and feature short races at every meet in the hope of developing championship material.

Hitherto the club's coaching staff has maintained that the only way to produce successful swimmers was to teach them a correct stroke before allowing them to undertake speed work, and not only were the candidates trained over fairly long courses at moderate pace, but no races at less than 100 yards were ever held in the home pool.

Whether due or not to this adopted system, it remains a fact that during the past few seasons the local organization has been able to place in the field several champions and record-breakers in the middle and long distances, but no sprinters fast enough to defeat the leaders of other districts.

As a result the committee has been induced to try the new method, its supporters claiming that it is easier to develop a good sprinter than middle-distance man, and that a recruit, having acquired skill at the dashes, will have no difficulty in gradually increasing his courses until he can travel the longest at proportionate rate. They point in support of their theory to McGillivray, Hebner, and other title-holders, who started as sprinters and are now all-round champions.

Whatever the outcome of the experiment, and not a few competent judges have opposite views on the subject, it promises to be conclusive, for the New York Athletic Club has this year a wealth of timber in all stages of development, so that benefit should come to the sport.

In accordance with the new policy, the programme for the opening indoor meet of the season on Dec. 5 has been made up entirely of dashes. The three swimming events to be decided are handicaps at fifty and one hundred yards, and a two-hundred-yard relay race for teams of four men, each to cover fifty yards.

Seton Hall in Basket Ball.

Seton Hall College has the reputation of always turning out a high-class basket-ball team. The Divinity students' best claim for distinction last season was two victories over the New York University quintet, the conquerors of Columbia University. This season's schedule is harder than the average, and includes games with College of the City of New York, Yale, New York University, Dartmouth, Fordham, Georgetown, and other Eastern universities. The first appearance of the season in New York for Seton Hall College will be on Saturday evening, Nov. 28, when they open the season at the Ninety-second Street Young Men's Hebrew Association.

YACHTSMEN HOPE FOR GOOD SEASON

An America's Cup Race Hardly Likely, but Other Events Are Planned--Motor Boat Races.

The annual meetings of the yacht clubs in the vicinity of New York are held during a period of about six weeks, beginning early in December. Most of the nominations are made some time earlier, and apropos of the reorganizations for the ensuing year, the men who are particularly interested in yacht racing, and especially those upon whom rests the management of racing events, begin their forecasts for the coming season and their canvass of the possibilities for racing in the various classes. At present the outlook for 1915 is not particularly one to create enthusiasm in itself, nor is it one to engender any particularly depressing influence.

Of course conditions in Europe will have more or less influence in the racing in America, even though we are not concerned directly in the war. The outbreak of hostilities during the past Summer had a decidedly untoward influence on racing, in which New Yorkers were interested, because of the tremendous jolt the financial structure of the country sustained. It so happens that the racing in larger classes is almost exclusively in the hands of men who are prominent in the financial world, either as bankers, brokers, heavy investors, or as leaders in the great industrial operations, and because these men found it necessary to return to their places of business early in August last, the cruise of the New York Yacht Club was abandoned when half completed. The abandonment of the proposed contest for the America's Cup followed as a matter of course.

As to the coming season, some of the big men in the sport are rather gloomy in their forecasts. Of course, this country is rapidly recovering from the shock it received about the first of August, and the presumption now is that in very many lines of business conditions very close to normal will prevail next Summer.

It goes without saying that there will be no contest for the America's Cup until the war is ended. At present the event is under an agreement of postponement for a year, and of course the New York Yacht Club will agree to any further postponement that may be necessary until peace is at least in sight. Meanwhile Shamrock IV. is housed under a galvanized iron shed in Brooklyn. No new challenge will be required, inasmuch as an agreement to postpone from time to time will continue the original challenge in force.

What the New York Yacht Club may do in the matter of its annual cruise is something to be determined by the new flag officers, and undoubtedly will not be determined for several months to come. The sentiment as regards the conditions created by the war will have considerable effect on the cruise. As to the other racing clubs in and around New York waters, the ordinary schedules will undoubtedly be carried out, and while the racing fleets may not be quite as large as were those of the past Summer, there will doubtless be sufficient interest to produce good racing.

In the field of motor boat racing, the international event is, so to speak, up in the air. The British International Trophy is now held by the Motor Yacht Club of Great Britain. A challenge was duly issued for a race in 1914, by the Motor Boat Club of America, and Commodore James E. Pugh of Chicago, who is one of the Trustees of that club, went to England with his new Disturber IV. in July, ready to race. He had hardly arrived at Southampton, however, before all Southampton waters were closed for any purpose whatever, excepting for naval operations, and it became necessary to abandon the race. There have been no formal communications between the two clubs concerning a postponement, but the circumstances were not quite similar to those in the matter of the America's Cup race. It was the challenger, in that case, who asked for a postponement and the holder who granted it, while in the case of the Motor Boat Trophy the challenger was on hand ready to race and the holders found it impossible to carry out the programme. Of course, there will be no especial embarrassment when the time arrives at which a race can be held, but it so happens that there has been no formal understanding as yet.

One real big event in motor boat racing for the coming year, in so far as the present outlook is concerned, will be the race for cruising boats from New York to San Francisco, by way of the Panama Canal. This race is to be held, generally speaking, under the rules of the American Power Boat Association.

The competing boats must be at least 55 feet in length on the water line, and not over 100 feet. There will be six ports of call, at which a total of stops of 72 hours must be made, and the time may be divided among the six ports at the convenience of the skippers. These are Charleston and Key West on the Atlantic coast and Corinto, Nicarragua, Salina and San Blas, Mexico, and San Pedro, California. For any excess of 72 hours of stops at these points, the contestants will receive no credit. Reporting stations will be provided at each of these places at which the boats must "check in and check out." A period of 48 hours is allowed for the passage through the Canal and a boat must not leave Balboa at the southern end of the Canal until the expiration of the 48 hours after the entrance at Colon. Prizes aggregating $10,000 are offered.

The application of the Corinthian principle as embodied in the A. P. B. A. rules is going to work out rather curiously in this race. Under the rules it is the helmsman who must be an amateur, or Corinthian. In case of short distance racing, and especially of racing boats, it is the helmsman whose skill counts in the handling of the boat and in the making of speed, but in this long distance race it will be the work of the helmsman which will count so much as that of the navigator, and the navigator may be a professional but if a professional, must not touch the wheel, under the rules.

This race will start about Oct. 1 next, and entries will be received until up to within a very few days of the start. A good deal of interest has already been displayed in this race, and several men have already announced their intention of building boats for the purpose. One man who contemplates building objects quite seriously to a clause in the rules which permits a Race Committee, if it considers it expedient, to reject any entry without giving any reason therefor.

One of the important racing events in the East next Summer will be the contest for the American Power Boat Association Gold Cup, which was won last August on Lake George by Mrs. Blackton's boat, Baby Speed Demon, enrolled in the Motor Boat Club of America. Upon that club, therefore, rests the responsibility of defending the cup in the contest next Summer. There may be considerable discussion as to the place of the race. The Lake George Regatta Association, from which the cup was won last year, is already exerting its influence to secure the race for Lake George, and has issued a challenge for the cup.

HANDLE FOOTBALL CROWD.

New Haven Railroad Announces Plans for Trains Service to New Haven.

The annual gridiron battle between Yale and Harvard on Saturday will be the occasion of the formal opening of the new Yale Bowl and probably more than 70,000 persons will attend the game. Of the number probably 35,000 will travel to New Haven by train, and in order to handle this great mass movement of passengers the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad has completed plans which are expected to materially facilitate the handling of this crowd.

Traffic officials of the New Haven road have been at work for some time making arrangements to handle this number of people with dispatch and smoothness and without interfering with the regular service of the railroad. The plans made provide for a service from New York of twenty-five special trains, the first leaving at 8:10 A. M. Fifteen special trains will run from Boston and other points, the Boston service beginning at 8 A. M. All regular trains to and from New Haven the day of the game will be provided with extra equipment to their full capacity. Trains operated from New York will have an aggregate carrying capacity of 20,000 passengers; trains from Boston will have a capacity of 10,000, and trains from other points a capacity of 5,000.

As previously announced, no private cars from New York will be moved during the period covered by this schedule. Private cars will have to move the day previous, or at least in time for arrival at New Haven before 8 A. M. the day of the game. It will not be possible for private cars to leave New Haven after the game before 8 P. M.

To facilitate the handling of all these trains at New Haven some unusual steps have been taken this year. Ordinarily much switching is done at New Haven

"COMMON SENSE ABOUT THE WAR"

An Amazing Article Written for The New York Times

By George Bernard Shaw

This Article Is Copyrighted in the United States of America and Canada by The New York Times. Republication of It in Whole or in Part Is Forbidden.

"Let a European war break out—the war, perhaps, between the Triple Alliance and the Triple Entente, which so many journalists and politicians in England and Germany contemplate with criminal levity. If the combatants prove to be equally balanced, it may, after the first battles, smoulder on for thirty years. What will be the population of London, or Manchester, or Chemnitz, or Bremen, or Milan, at the end of it?" ("The Great Society," by Graham Wallas. June 1914.)

By George Bernard Shaw.

(Copyright, 1914,

By The New York Times Company.)

THE time has now come to pluck up courage and begin to talk and write soberly about the war. At first the mere horror of it stunned the more thoughtful of us; and even now only those who are not in actual contact with or bereaved relation to its heartbreaking wreckage can think sanely about it, or endure to hear others discuss it coolly. As to the thoughtless, well, not for a moment dare I suggest that for the first few weeks they were all scared out of their wits; for I know too well that the British civilian does not allow his perfect courage to be questioned: only experienced soldiers and foreigners are allowed the infirmity of fear. But they certainly were—shall I say a little upset? They felt in that solemn hour that England was lost if only one single traitor in their midst let slip the truth about anything in the universe. It was a perilous time for me. I do not hold my tongue easily; and my inborn dramatic faculty and professional habit as a playwright prevent me from taking a one-sided view even when the most probable result of taking a many-sided one is prompt lynching. Besides, until Home Rule emerges from its present suspended animation, I shall retain my Irish capacity for criticizing England with something of the detachment of a foreigner, and perhaps with a certain slightly malicious taste for taking the conceit out of her. Lord Kitchener made a mistake the other day in rebuking the Irish volunteers for not rallying faster to the defence of "their country." They do not regard it as their country yet. He should have asked them to come forward as usual and help poor old England through a stiff fight. Then it would have been all right.

Having thus frankly confessed my bias, which you can allow for as a rifleman allows for the wind, I give my views for what they are worth. They will be of some use; because, however blinded I may be by prejudice or perversity, my prejudices in this matter are not those which blind the British patriot, and therefore I am fairly sure to see some things that have not yet struck him.

And first, I do not see this war as one which has welded Governments and peoples into complete and sympathetic solidarity as against the common enemy. I see the people of England united in a fierce detestation and defiance of the views and acts of Prussian Junkerism. And I see the German people stirred to the depths by a similar antipathy to English Junkerism, and anger at the apparent treachery and duplicity of the attack made on them by us in their extremest peril from France and Russia. I see both nations duped, but alas! not quite unwillingly duped, by their Junkers and Militarists into wreaking on one another the wrath they should have spent in destroying Junkerism and Militarism in their own country. And I see the Junkers and Militarists of England and Germany jumping at the chance they have longed for in vain for many years of smashing one another and establishing their own oligarchy as the dominant military power in the world. No doubt the heroic remedy for this tragic misunderstanding is that both armies should shoot their officers and go home to gather in their harvests in the villages and make a revolution in the towns; and though this is not at present a practicable solution, it must be frankly mentioned, because it or something like it is always a possibility in a defeated conscript army if its commanders push it beyond human endurance when its eyes are opening to the fact that in murdering its neighbours it is biting off its nose to vex its face, besides riveting the intolerable yoke of Militarism and Junkerism more tightly than ever on its own neck. But there is no chance—or, as our Junkers would put it, no danger—of our soldiers yielding to such an ecstasy of common sense. They have enlisted voluntarily; they are not defeated nor likely to be; their communications are intact and their meals reasonably punctual; they are as pugnacious as their officers; and in fighting Prussia they are fighting a more deliberate, conscious, tyrannical, personally insolent, and dangerous Militarism than their own. Still, even for a voluntary professional army, that possibility exists, just as for the civilian there is a limit beyond which taxation, bankruptcy, privation, terror, and inconvenience cannot be pushed without revolution or a social dissolution more ruinous than submission to conquest. I mention all this, not to make myself wantonly disagreeable, but because military persons, thinking naturally that there is nothing like leather, are now talking of this war as likely to become a permanent institution like the Chamber of Horrors at Madame Tussaud's, forgetting, I think, that the rate of consumption maintained by modern military operations is much greater relatively to the highest possible rate of production maintainable under the restrictions of war time than it has ever been before.

The Day of Judgment.

The European settlement at the end of the war will be effected, let us hope, not by a regimental mess of fire-eaters sitting around an up-ended drum in a vanquished Berlin or Vienna, but by some sort of Congress in which all the Powers (including, very importantly, the United States of America) will be represented. Now I foresee a certain danger of our being taken by surprise at that Congress, and making ourselves unnecessarily difficult and unreasonable, by presenting ourselves to it in the character of Injured Innocence. We shall not be accepted in that character. Such a Congress will most certainly regard us as being, next to the Prussians (if it makes even that exception), the most quarrelsome people in the universe. I am quite conscious of the surprise and scandal this anticipation may cause among my more highminded (hochnaesig, the Germans call it) readers. Let me therefore break it gently by expatiating for a while on the subject of Junkerism and Militarism generally, and on the history of the literary propaganda of war between England and Potsdam which has been going on openly for the last forty years on both sides. I beg the patience of my readers during this painful operation. If it becomes unbearable, they can always put the paper down and relieve themselves by calling the Kaiser Attila and Mr. Keir Hardie a traitor twenty times or so. Then they will feel, I hope, refreshed enough to resume. For, after all, abusing the Kaiser or Keir Hardie or me will not hurt the Germans, whereas a clearer view of the political situation will certainly help us. Besides, I do not believe that the trueborn Englishman in his secret soul relishes the pose of Injured Innocence any more than I do myself. He puts it on only because he is told that it is respectable.

Junkers All.

What is a Junker? Is it a German officer of twenty-three, with offensive manners, and a habit of cutting down innocent civilians with his sabre? Sometimes; but not at all exclusively that or anything like that. Let us resort to the dictionary. I turn to the Encyclopaedisches Woerterbuch of Muret Sanders. Excuse its quaint German-English.

Junker=Young nobleman, younker, lording, country squire, country gentleman, squirearch. Junkerherrschaft=squirearchy, landocracy. Junkerleben=Life of a country gentleman, (figuratively) a jolly life. Junkerpartei=country party. Junkerwirtschaft=doings of the country party.

Thus we see that the Junker is by no means peculiar to Prussia. We may claim to produce the article in a perfection that may well make Germany despair of ever surpassing us in that line. Sir Edward Grey is a Junker from his topmost hair to the tips of his toes; and Sir Edward is a charming man, incapable of cutting down even an Opposition front bencher, or of telling a German he intends to have him shot. Lord Cromer is a Junker. Mr. Winston Churchill is an odd and not disagreeable compound of Junker and Yankee: his frank anti-German pugnacity is enormously more popular than the moral babble (Milton's phrase) of his sanctimonious colleagues. He is a bumptious and jolly Junker, just as Lord Curzon is an uppish Junker. I need not string out the list. In these islands the Junker is literally all over the shop.

It is very difficult for anyone who is not either a Junker or a successful barrister to get into an English Cabinet, no matter which party is in power, or to avoid resigning when we strike up the drum. The Foreign Office is a Junker Club. Our governing classes are overwhelmingly Junker: all who are not Junkers are riff-raff whose only claim to their position is the possession of ability of some sort: mostly ability to make money. And, of course, the Kaiser is a Junker, though less truculent than the Crown Prince, and much less autocratic than Sir Edward Grey, who, without consulting us, sends us to war by a word to an ambassador and pledges all our wealth to his foreign allies by a stroke of his pen.

What Is a Militarist?

Now that we know what a Junker is, let us have a look at the Militarists. A Militarist is a person who believes that all real power is the power to kill, and that Providence is on the side of the big battalions. The most famous Militarist at present, thanks to the zeal with which we have bought and quoted his book, is General Friedrich Von Bernhardi. But we cannot allow the General to take precedence of our own writers as a Militarist propagandist. I am old enough to remember the beginning of the anti-German phase of that very ancient propaganda in England. The Franco-Prussian war of 1870-1871 left Europe very much taken aback. Up to that date nobody was afraid of Prussia, though everybody was a little afraid of France; and we were keeping "buffer States" between ourselves and Russia in the east. Germany had indeed beaten Denmark; but then Denmark was a little State, and was abandoned in her hour of need by those who should have helped her, to the great indignation of Ibsen. Germany had also beaten Austria; but somehow everybody seems able to beat Austria, though nobody seems able to draw the moral that defeats do not matter as much as the Militarists think, Austria being as important as ever. Suddenly Germany beat France right down into the dust, by the exercise of an organized efficiency in war of which nobody up to then had any conception. There was not a State in Europe that did not say to itself: "Good Heavens! what would happen if she attacked us?" We in England thought of our old-fashioned army, and our old-fashioned commander George Ranger (of Cambridge), and our War Office with its Crimean tradition of imbecility; and we shook in our shoes. But we were not such fools as to leave it at that. We soon produced the first page of the Bernhardian literature: an anonymous booklet entitled The Battle of Dorking. It was not the first page of English Militarist literature: you have only to turn back to the burst of glorification of war which heralded the silly Crimean campaign (Tennyson's Maud is a surviving sample) to find paeans to Mars which would have made Treitschke blush (perhaps they did); but it was the first page in which it was assumed as a matter of course that Germany and not France or Russia was England's natural enemy. The Battle of Dorking had an enormous sale; and the wildest guesses were current as to its authorship. And its moral was "To arms; or the Germans will besiege London as they besieged Paris." From that time until the present, the British propaganda of war with Germany has never ceased. The lead given by The Battle of Dorking was taken up by articles in the daily press and the magazines. Later on came the Jingo fever (anti-Russian, by the way; but let us not mention that just now), Stead's Truth About the Navy, Mr. Spenser Wilkinson, the suppression of the Channel Tunnel, Mr. Robert Blatchford, Mr. Garvin, Admiral Maxse, Mr. Newbolt, Mr. Rudyard Kipling, The National Review, Lord Roberts, the Navy League, the imposition of an Imperialist Foreign Secretary on the Liberal Cabinet, Mr. Wells's War in the Air (well worth re-reading just now), and the Dreadnoughts. Throughout all these agitations the enemy, the villain of the piece, the White Peril, was Prussia and her millions of German conscripts. At first, in The Battle of Dorking phase, the note was mainly defensive. But from the moment when the Kaiser began to copy our Armada policy by building a big fleet, the anti-German agitation became openly aggressive; and the cry that the German fleet or ours must sink, and that a war between England and Germany was bound to come some day, speedily ceased to be merely a cry with our Militarists and became an axiom with them. And what our Militarists said our Junkers echoed; and our Junker diplomatists played for. The story of how they manoeuvred to hem Germany and Austria in with an Anglo-Franco-Russian combination will be found told with soldierly directness and with the proud candor of a man who can see things from his own side only in the article by Lord Roberts in the current number of The Hibbert Journal (October 1914). There you shall see also, after the usual nonsense about Nietzsche, the vision of "British administrators bearing the White Man's Burden," of "young men, fresh from the public schools of Britain, coming eagerly forward to carry on the high traditions of Imperial Britain in each new dependency which comes under our care," of "our fitness as an Imperial race," of "a great task committed to us by Providence," of "the will to conquer that has never failed us," of our task of "assuming control of one-fifth of the earth's surface and the care of one in five of all the inhabitants of the world." Not a suggestion that the inhabitants of the world are perhaps able to take care of themselves. Not even a passing recollection when that White Man's Burden is in question that the men outside the British Empire, and even inside the German Empire, are by no means exclusively black. Only the sancta simplicitas that glories in "the proud position of England," the "sympathy, tolerance, prudence and benevolence of our rule" in the east (as shown, the Kaiser is no doubt sarcastically remarking, in the Delhi sedition trial), the chivalrous feeling that it is our highest duty to save the world from the horrible misfortune of being governed by anybody but those young men fresh from the public schools of Britain. Change the words Britain and British to Germany and German, and the Kaiser will sign the article with enthusiasm. His opinion, his attitude (subject to that merely verbal change) word for word.

Six of One: Half-a-Dozen of The Other.

Now, please observe that I do not say that the agitation was unreasonable. I myself steadily advocated the formation of a formidable armament, and ridiculed the notion that we, who are wasting hundreds of millions annually on idlers and wasters, could not easily afford double, treble, quadruple our military and naval expenditure. I advocated the compulsion of every man to serve his country, both in war and peace. The idlers and wasters perceiving dimly that I meant the cost to come out of their pockets, and meant to use the admission that riches should not exempt a man from military service as an illustration of how absurd it is to allow them to exempt him from civil service, did not embrace my advocacy with enthusiasm; so I must reaffirm it now lest it should be supposed that I am condemning those whose proceedings I am describing. Though often horribly wrong in principle, they were quite right in practice as far as they went. But they must stand to their guns now that the guns are going off. They must not pretend that they were harmless Radical lovers of peace, and that the propaganda of Militarism and of inevitable war between England and Germany is a Prussian infamy for which the Kaiser must be severely punished. That is not fair, not true, not gentlemanly. We began it; and if they met us half-way, as they certainly did, it is not for us to reproach them. When the German fire-eaters drank to The Day (of Armageddon) they were drinking to the day of which our Navy League fire-eaters had first said "It's bound to come." Therefore, let us have no more nonsense about the Prussian Wolf and the British Lamb, the Prussian Machiavelli and the English Evangelist. We cannot shout for years that we are boys of the bulldog breed, and then suddenly pose as gazelles. No. When Europe and America come to settle the treaty that will end this business (for America is concerned in it as much as we are), they will not deal with us as the lovable and innocent victims of a treacherous tyrant and a savage soldiery. They will have to consider how these two incorrigibly pugnacious and inveterately snobbish peoples, who have snarled at one another for forty years with bristling hair and grinning fangs, and are now rolling over with their teeth in one another's throats, are to be tamed into trusty watchdogs of the peace of the world. I am sorry to spoil the saintly image with a halo which the British Jingo journalist sees just now when he looks in the glass; but it must be done if we are to behave reasonably in the imminent day of reckoning.

And now back to Friedrich von Bernhardi.

General Von Bernhardi.

Like many soldier-authors, Friedrich is very readable; and he maintains the good and formidable part of the Bismarck tradition: that is, he is not a humbug. He looks facts in the face; he deceives neither himself nor his readers; and if he were to tell lies—as he would no doubt do as stoutly as any British, French, or Russian officer if his country's safety were at stake—he would know that he was telling them. Which last we think very bad taste on his part, if not downright wickedness.

It is true that he cites Frederick the Great as an exemplary master of war and of Weltpolitik. But his chief praise in this department is reserved for England. It is from our foreign policy, he says, that he has learnt what our journalists denounce as "the doctrine of the bully, of the materialist, of the man with gross ideals: a doctrine of diabolical evil." He frankly accepts that doctrine from us (as if our poor, honest muddleheads had ever formulated anything so intellectual as a doctrine), and blames us for nothing but for allowing the United States to achieve their solidarity and become formidable to us when we might have divided them by backing up the South in the Civil War. He shows in the clearest way that if Germany does not smash England, England will smash Germany by springing at her the moment she can catch her at a disadvantage. In a word he prophesies that we, his great masters in Realpolitik, will do precisely what our Junkers have just made us do. It is we who have carried out the Bernhardi programme: it is Germany who has neglected it. He warned Germany to make an alliance with Italy, Austria, Turkey, and America, before undertaking the subjugation, first of France, then of England. But a prophet is not without honour save in his own country; and Germany has allowed herself to be caught with no ally but Austria between France and Russia, and thereby given the English Junkers their opportunity. They have seized it with a punctuality that must flatter Von Bernhardi, even though the compliment be at the expense of his own country. The Kaiser did not give them credit for being keener Junkers than his own. It was an unpleasant, indeed an infuriating surprise. All that a Kaiser could do without unbearable ignominy to induce them to keep their bulldogs off and give him fair play with his two redoubtable foes, he did. But they laughed Frederick the Great's laugh and hurled all our forces at him, as he might have done to us, on Bernhardian principles, if he had caught us at the same disadvantage. Officially, the war is Junker-cut-Junker, Militarist-cut-Militarist; and we must fight it out, not Heuchler-cut-Hypocrite, but hammer and tongs.

Militarist Myopia.

Unofficially, it is quite another matter. Democracy, even Social-Democracy, though as hostile to British Junkers as to German ones, and under no illusion as to the obsolescence and colossal stupidity of modern war, need not lack enthusiasm for the combat, which may serve their own ends better than those of their political opponents. For Bernhardi the Brilliant and our own very dull Militarists are alike mad: the war will not do any of the things for which they rushed into it. It is much more likely to do the things they most dread and deprecate: in fact, it has already swept them into the very kind of organization they founded an Anti-Socialist League to suppress. To shew how mad they are, let us suppose the war carries out their western program to the last item. Suppose France rises from the war victorious, happy and glorious, with Alsace and Lorraine regained, Rheims cathedral repaired in the best modern trade style, and a prodigious indemnity in her pocket! Suppose we tow the German fleet into Portsmouth, and leave Hohenzollern metaphorically under the heel of Romanoff and actually in a comfortable villa in Chislehurst, the hero of all its tea parties and the judge of all its gymkhanas! Well, cry the Militarists, suppose it by all means: could we desire anything better? Now I happen to have a somewhat active imagination; and it flatly refuses to stop at this convenient point. I must go on supposing. Suppose France, with its military prestige raised once more to the Napoleonic point, spends its indemnity in building an invincible Armada, stronger and nearer to us than the German one we are now out to destroy! Suppose Sir Edward Grey remonstrates, and Monsieur Delcasse replies, "Russia and France have humbled one Imperial Bully, and are prepared to humble another. I have not forgotten Fashoda. Stop us if you can; or turn, if you like, for help to the Germany we have smashed and disarmed!" Of what use will all this bloodshed be then, with the old situation reproduced in an aggravated form, the enemy closer to our shores, a raid far more feasible, the tradition of "natural enmity" to steel the foe, and Waterloo to be wiped out like Sedan? A child in arms should be able to see that this idiotic notion of relaxing the military pressure on us by smashing this or that particular Power is like trying to alter the pressure of the ocean by dipping up a bucket of water from the North Sea and pouring it into the Bay of Biscay.

I purposely omit more easterly supposings as to what victorious Russia might do. But a noble emancipation of Poland and Finland at her own expense, and of Bosnia and Herzegovina at Austria's, might easily suggest to our nervous Militarists that a passion for the freedom of Egypt and India might seize her, and remind her that we were Japan's ally in the day of Russia's humiliation in Manchuria. So there at once is your Balance of Power problem in Asia enormously aggravated by throwing Germany out of the anti-Russian scale and grinding her to powder. Even in North Africa—but enough is enough. You can durchhauen your way out of the frying pan, but only into the fire. Better take Nietzsche's brave advice, and make it your point of honour to "live dangerously." History shews that it is often the way to live long.

Learning Nothing: Forgetting Everything.

But let me test the Militarist theory, not by a hypothetical future, but by the accomplished and irrevocable past. Is it true that nations must conquer or go under, and that military conquest means prosperity and power for the victor and annihilation for the vanquished? I have already alluded in passing to the fact that Austria has been beaten repeatedly: by France, by Italy, by Germany, almost by everybody who has thought it worth while to have a whack at her; and yet she is one of the Great Powers; and her alliance has been sought by invincible Germany. France was beaten by Germany in 1870 with a completeness that seemed impossible; yet France has since enlarged her territory whilst Germany is still pleading in vain for a place in the sun. Russia was beaten by the Japanese in Manchuria on a scale that made an end forever of the old notion that the West is the natural military superior of the East; yet it is the terror of Russia that has driven Germany into her present desperate onslaught on France; and it is the Russian alliance on which France and England are depending for their assurance of ultimate success. We ourselves confess that the military efficiency with which we have so astonished the Germans is the effect, not of Waterloo and Inkerman, but of the drubbing we got from the Boers, who would probably have beaten us if we had been anything like their own size. Greece has lately distinguished herself in war within a few years by a most disgraceful beating of the Turks. It would be easy to multiply instances from remoter history: for example, the effect on England's position of the repeated defeats of our troops by the French under Luxembourg in the Balance of Power War at the end of the seventeenth century differed surprisingly little, if at all, from the effect of our subsequent victories under Marlborough. And the inference from the Militarist theory that the States which at present count for nothing as military Powers necessarily count for nothing at all is absurd on the face of it. Monaco seems to be, on the whole, the most prosperous and comfortable State in Europe.

Another Bogus Science.

In short, Militarism must be classed as one of the most inconsiderately foolish of the bogus "sciences" which the last half century has produced in such profusion, and which have the common characteristic of revolting all sane souls, and being stared out of countenance by the broad facts of human experience. The only rule of thumb that can be hazarded on the strength of actual practice is that wars to maintain or upset the Balance of Power between States, called by inaccurate people Balance of Power wars, and by accurate people Jealousy of Power wars, never establish the desired peaceful and secure equilibrium. They may exercise pugnacity, gratify spite, assuage a wound to national pride, or enhance or dim a military reputation; but that is all. And the reason is, as I shall shew very conclusively later on, that there is only one way in which one nation can really disable another, and that is a way which no civilized nation dare even discuss.

Are We Hypocrites?

And now I proceed from general considerations to the diplomatic history of the present case, as I must in order to make our moral position clear. But first, lest I should lose all credit by the startling incompatibility between the familiar personal character of our statesmen and the proceedings for which they are officially responsible, I must say a word about the peculiar psychology of English statesmanship, not only for the benefit of my English readers (who do not know that it is peculiar just as they do not know that water has any taste because it is always in their mouths), but as a plea for a more charitable construction from the wider world.

We know by report, however unjust it may seem to us, that there is an opinion abroad, even in the quarters most friendly to us, that our excellent qualities are marred by an incorrigible hypocrisy. To France we have always been Perfidious Albion. In Germany, at this moment, that epithet would be scorned as far too flattering to us. Victor Hugo explained the relative unpopularity of Measure for Measure among Shakespeare's plays on the ground that the character of the hypocrite Angelo was a too faithful dramatization of our national character. Pecksniff is not considered so exceptional an English gentleman in America as he is in England.

Now we have not acquired this reputation for nothing. The world has no greater interest in branding England with this particular vice of hypocrisy than in branding France with it; yet the world does not cite Tartuffe as a typical Frenchman as it cites Angelo and Pecksniff as typical Englishmen. We may protest against it as indignantly as the Prussian soldiers protest against their equally universal reputation for ferocity in plunder and pillage, sack and rapine; but there is something in it. If you judge an English statesman by his conscious intentions, his professions, and his personal charm, you will often find him an amiable, upright, humane, anxiously truthful man. If you judge him, as a foreigner must, solely on the official acts for which he is responsible, and which he has to defend in the House of Commons for the sake of his party, you will often be driven to conclude that this estimable gentleman is, in point of being an unscrupulous superprig and fool, worse than Caesar Borgia and General Von Bernhardi rolled into one, and in foreign affairs a Bismarck in everything except commanding ability, blunt common sense, and freedom from illusion as to the nature and object of his own diplomacy. And the permanent officials in whose hands he is will probably deserve all that and something to spare. Thus you will get that amazing contrast that confronts us now between the Machiavellian Sir Edward Grey of the Berlin newspapers and the amiable and popular Sir Edward Grey we know in England. In England we are all prepared to face any World Congress and say, "We know that Sir Edward Grey is an honest English gentleman, who meant well as a true patriot and friend of peace; we are quite sure that what he did was fair and right; and we will not listen to any nonsense to the contrary." The Congress will reply, "We know nothing about Sir Edward Grey except what he did; and as there is no secret and no question as to what he did, the whole story being recorded by himself, we must hold England responsible for his conduct, whilst taking your word for the fact, which has no importance for us, that his conduct has nothing to do with his character."

Our Intellectual Laziness.

The general truth of the situation is, as I have spent so much of my life in trying to make the English understand, that we are cursed with a fatal intellectual laziness, an evil inheritance from the time when our monopoly of coal and iron made it possible for us to become rich and powerful without thinking or knowing how: a laziness which is becoming highly dangerous to us now that our monopoly is gone or superseded by new sources of mechanical energy. We got rich by pursuing our own immediate advantage instinctively: that is, with a natural childish selfishness; and when any question of our justification arose, we found it easy to silence it with any sort of plausible twaddle (provided it flattered us, and did not imply any trouble or sacrifice) provided by our curates at £70 a year, or our journalists at a penny a line, or commercial moralists with axes to grind. In the end we became fatheaded, and not only lost all intellectual consciousness of what we were doing, and with it all power of objective self-criticism, but stacked up a lumber of pious phrases for ourselves which not only satisfied our corrupted and half-atrophied consciences, but gave us a sense that there is something extraordinarily ungentlemanly and politically dangerous in bringing these pious phrases to the test of conduct. We carried Luther's doctrine of Justification by Faith to the insane point of believing that as long as a man says what we have agreed to accept as the right thing it does not matter in the least what he actually does. In fact, we do not clearly see why a man need introduce the subject of morals at all, unless there is something questionable to be whitewashed. The unprejudiced foreigner calls this hypocrisy: that is why we call him prejudiced. But I, who have been a poor man in a poor country, understand the foreigner better.

Now from the general to the particular. In describing the course of the diplomatic negotiations by which our Foreign Office achieved its design of at last settling accounts with Germany at the most favourable moment from the Militarist point of view, I shall have to exhibit our Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs as behaving almost exactly as we have accused the Kaiser of behaving. Yet I see him throughout as an honest gentleman, "perplexed in the extreme," meaning well, revolted at the last moment by the horror of war, clinging to the hope that in some vague way he could persuade everybody to be reasonable if they would only come and talk to him as they did when the big Powers were kept out of the Balkan war, but hopelessly destitute of a positive policy of any kind, and therefore unable to resist those who had positive business in hand. And do not for a moment imagine that I think that the conscious Sir Edward Grey was Othello, and the subconscious, Iago. I do think that the Foreign Office, of which Sir Edward is merely the figure head, was as deliberately and consciously bent on a long deferred Militarist war with Germany as the Admiralty was; and that is saying a good deal. If Sir Edward Grey did not know what he wanted, Mr. Winston Churchill was in no such perplexity. He was not an "ist" of any sort, but a straightforward holder of the popular opinion that if you are threatened you should hit out, unless you are afraid to. Had he had the conduct of the affair he might quite possibly have averted the war (and thereby greatly disappointed himself and the British public) by simply frightening the Kaiser. As it was, he had arranged for the co-operation of the French and British fleets; was spoiling for the fight; and must have restrained himself with great difficulty from taking off his coat in public whilst Mr. Asquith and Sir Edward Grey were giving the country the assurances which were misunderstood to mean that we were not bound to go to war, and not more likely to do so than usual. But though Sir Edward did not clear up the misunderstanding, I think he went to war with the heavy heart of a Junker Liberal (such centaurs exist) and not with the exultation of a Junker Jingo.

I may now, without more than the irreducible minimum of injustice to Sir Edward Grey, proceed to tell the story of the diplomatic negotiations as they will appear to the Congress which, I am assuming, will settle the terms on which Europe is to live more or less happily ever after.

Diplomatic History of the War.

The evidence of how the Junker diplomatists of our Foreign Office let us in for the war is in the White Paper, Miscellaneous No. 6 (1914), containing correspondence respecting the European crisis, and since reissued, with a later White Paper and some extra matter, as a penny bluebook in miniature. In these much-cited and little-read documents we see the Junkers of all the nations, the men who have been saying for years "It's bound to come," and clamouring in England for compulsory military service and expeditionary forces, momentarily staggered and not a little frightened by the sudden realization that it has come at last. They rush round from foreign office to embassy, and from embassy to palace, twittering "This is awful. Can't you stop it? Won't you be reasonable? Think of the consequences," etc., etc. One man among them keeps his head and looks the facts in the face. That man is Sazonoff, the Russian Secretary for Foreign Affairs. He keeps steadily trying to make Sir Edward Grey face the inevitable. He says and reiterates, in effect, "You know very well that you cannot keep out of a European war. You know you are pledged to fight Germany if Germany attacks France. You know that your arrangements for the fight are actually made; that already the British army is commanded by a Franco-British Council of War; that there is no possible honourable retreat for you. You know that this old man in Austria, who would have been superannuated years ago if he had been an excisman, is resolved to make war on Servia, and sent that silly forty-eight hours ultimatum when we were all out of town so that he could begin fighting before we could get back to sit on his head. You know that he has the Jingo mob of Vienna behind him. You know that if he makes war, Russia must mobilize. You know that France is bound to come in with us as you are with France. You know that the moment we mobilize, Germany, the old man's ally, will have only one desperate chance of victory, and that is to overwhelm our ally, France, with one superb rush of her millions, and then sweep back and meet us on the Vistula. You know that nothing can stop this except Germany remonstrating with Austria, and insisting on the Servian case being dealt with by an international tribunal and not by war. You know that Germany dares not do this, because her alliance with Austria is her defence against the Franco-Russian alliance, and that she does not want to do it in any case, because the Kaiser naturally has a strong class prejudice against the blowing up of Royal personages by irresponsible revolutionists, and thinks nothing too bad for Servia after the assassination of the Archduke. There is just one chance of avoiding Armageddon: a slender one, but worth trying. You averted war in the Algeciras crisis, and again in the Agadir crisis, by saying you would fight. Try it again. The Kaiser is stiffnecked because he does not believe you are going to fight this time. Well, convince him that you are. The odds against him will then be so terrible that he may not dare to support the Austrian ultimatum to Servia at such a price. And if Austria is thus forced to proceed judicially against Servia, we Russians will be satisfied; and there will be no war."

Sir Edward could not see it. He is a member of a Liberal Government, in a country where there is no political career for the man who does not put his party's tenure of office before every other consideration. What would The Daily News and The Manchester Guardian have said had he, Bismarck-like, said bluntly: "If war once breaks out, the old score between England and Prussia will be settled, not by ambassadors' tea parties and Areopaguses, but by blood and iron"? In vain did Sazonoff repeat, "But if you are going to fight, as you know you are, why not say so?" Sir Edward, being Sir Edward and not Winston Churchill or Lloyd George, could not admit that he was going to fight. He might have forestalled the dying Pope and his noble Christian "I bless peace" by a noble, if heathen, "I fight war." Instead, he persuaded us all that he was under no obligation whatever to fight. He persuaded Germany that he had not the slightest serious intention of fighting. Sir Owen Seaman wrote in Punch an amusing and witty No-Intervention poem. Sporting Liberals offered any odds that there would be no war for England. And Germany, confident that with Austria's help she could break France with one hand and Russia with the other if England held aloof, let Austria throw the match into the magazine.

The Battery Unmasked.

Then the Foreign Office, always acting through its amiable and popular but confused instrument Sir Edward, unmasked the Junker-Militarist battery. He suddenly announced that England must take a hand in the war, though he did not yet tell the English people so, it being against the diplomatic tradition to tell them anything until it is too late for them to object. But he told the German Ambassador. Prince Lichnowsky, caught in a death trap, pleaded desperately for peace with Great Britain. Would we promise to spare Germany if Belgium were left untouched? No. Would we say on what conditions we would spare Germany? No. Not if the Germans promised not to annex French territory? No. Not even if they promised not to touch the French colonies? No. Was there no way out? Sir Edward Grey was frank. He admitted there was just one chance: that Liberal opinion might not stand the war if the neutrality of Belgium were not violated. And he provided against that chance by committing England to the war the day before he let the cat out of the bag in Parliament.

All this is recorded in the language of diplomacy in the White Paper on or between the lines. That language is not so straightforward as my language; but at the crucial points it is clear enough. Sazonoff's tone is politely diplomatic in No. 6; but in No. 17 he lets himself go. "I do not believe that Germany really wants war; but her attitude is decided by yours. If you take your stand firmly with France and Russia there will be no war. If you fail them now, rivers of blood will flow, and you will in the end be dragged into war." He was precisely right; but he did not realize that war was exactly what our Junkers wanted. They did not dare to tell themselves so; and naturally they did not dare to tell him so. And perhaps his own interest in war was too strong to make him regret the rejection of his honest advice. To break up the Austrian Empire and achieve for Russia the Slav Caliphate of South-East Europe whilst defeating Prussia with the help of France and of Russia's old enemy and Prussia's old ally England, was a temptation so enormous that Sazonoff, in resisting it so far as to shew Sir Edward Grey frankly the only chance of preventing it, proved himself the most genuine humanitarian in the diplomatic world.

Number 123.

The decisive communication between Sir Edward Grey and Prince Lichnowsky is recorded in the famous No. 123. With the rather childish subsequent attempt to minimize No. 123 on the ground that the Prince was merely an amiable nincompoop who did not really represent his fiendish sovereign, neither I nor any other serious person need be concerned. What is beyond all controversy is that after that conversation Prince Lichnowsky could do nothing but tell the Kaiser that the Entente, having at last got his imperial head in chancery, was not going to let him off on any terms, and that it was now a fight to a finish between the British and German empires. Then the Kaiser said: "We are Germans. God help us!" When a crowd of foolish students came cheering for the war under his windows, he bade them go to the churches and pray. His telegrams to the Tsar (the omission of which from the penny bluebook is, to say the least, not chivalrous) were dignified and pathetic. And when the Germans, taking a line from the poet they call "unser Shakespeare," said: "Come the four quarters of the world in arms and we shall shock them," it was, from the romantic militarist point of view, fine. What Junker-led men could do they have since done to make that thrasonical brag good. But there is no getting over the fact that, in Tommy Atkins's phrase, they had asked for it. Their Junkers, like ours, had drunk to The Day; and they should not have let us choose it after riling us for so many years. And that is why Sir Edward had a great surprise when he at last owned up in Parliament.

How the Nation Took It.

The moment he said that we could not "stand aside with our arms folded" and see our friend and neighbour France "bombarded and battered," the whole nation rose to applaud him. All the Foreign Office distrust of public opinion, the concealment of the Anglo-French plan of campaign, the disguise of the Entente in a quaker's hat, the duping of the British public and the Kaiser with one and the same prevarication, had been totally unnecessary and unpopular, like most of these ingenuities which diplomatists think subtle and Machiavellian. The British Public had all along been behind Mr. Winston Churchill. It had wanted Sir Edward to do just what Sazonoff wanted him to do, and what I, in the columns of The Daily News proposed he should do nine months ago (I must really be allowed to claim that I am not merely wise after the event), which was to arm to the teeth regardless of an expense which to us would have been a mere fleabite, and tell Germany that if she laid a finger on France we would unite with France to defeat her, offering her at the same time as consolation for that threat, the assurance that we would do as much to France if she wantonly broke the peace in the like fashion by attacking Germany. No unofficial Englishman worth his salt wanted to snivel hypocritically about our love of peace and our respect for treaties and our solemn acceptance of a painful duty, and all the rest of the nauseous mixture of schoolmaster's twaddle, parish magazine cant, and cinematograph melodrama with which we were deluged. We were perfectly ready to knock the Kaiser's head off just to teach him that if he thought he was going to ride roughshod over Europe, including our new friends the French, and the plucky little Belgians, he was reckoning without old England. And in this pugnacious but perfectly straightforward and human attitude the nation needed no excuses because the nation honestly did not know that we were taking the Kaiser at a disadvantage, or that the Franco-Russian alliance had been just as much a menace to peace as the Austro-German one. But the Foreign Office knew that very well, and therefore began to manufacture superfluous, disingenuous, and rather sickening excuses at a great rate. The nation had a clean conscience, and was really innocent of any aggressive strategy; the Foreign Office was redhanded, and did not want to be found out. Hence its sermons.

Mr. H. G. Wells Hoists the Country's Flag.

It was Mr. H. G. Wells who at the critical moment spoke with the nation's voice. When he uttered his electric outburst of wrath against "this drilling, trampling foolery in the heart of Europe" he gave expression to the pent-up exasperation of years of smouldering revolt against swank and domineer, guff and bugaboo, calling itself blood and iron, and mailed fist, and God and conscience and anything else that sounded superb. Like Nietzsche, we were "fed up" with the Kaiser's imprisonments of democratic journalists for Majestaetsbeleidigung (monarch disparagement), with his ancestors, and his mission, and his gospel of submission and obedience for poor men, and of authority, tempered by duelling, for rich men. The world had become sore-headed, and desired intensely that they who clatter the sword shall perish by the sword. Nobody cared twopence about treaties: indeed, it was not for us, who had seen the treaty of Berlin torn up by the brazen seizure of Bosnia and Herzegovina by Austria in 1909, and taken that lying down, as Russia did, to talk about the sacredness of treaties, even if the wastepaper baskets of the Foreign Offices were not full of torn up "scraps of paper," and a very good thing too; for General von Bernhardi's assumption that circumstances alter treaties is not a page from Machiavelli: it is a platitude from the law books. The man in the street understood little or nothing about Servia or Russia or any of the cards with which the diplomatists were playing their perpetual game of Beggar my Neighbour. We were rasped beyond endurance by Prussian Militarism and its contempt for us and for human happiness and common sense; and we just rose at it and went for it. We have set out to smash the Kaiser exactly as we set out to smash the Mahdi. Mr. Wells never mentioned a treaty. He said, in effect: "There stands the monster all freedom-loving men hate; and at last we are going to fight it." And the public, bored by the diplomatists, said: "Now you're talking!" We did not stop to ask our consciences whether the Prussian assumption that the dominion of the civilized earth belongs to German culture is really any more bumptious than the English assumption that the dominion of the sea belongs to British commerce. And in our island security we were as little able as ever to realize the terrible military danger of Germany's geographical position between France and England on her west flank and Russia on her east: all three leagued for her destruction; and how unreasonable it was to ask Germany to lose the fraction of a second (much less Sir Maurice de Bunsen's naïve "a few days delay") in dashing at her Western foe when she could obtain no pledge as to Western intentions. "We are now in a state of necessity; and Necessity knows no law," said the Imperial Chancellor in the Reichstag. "It is a matter of life and death to us," said the German Minister for Foreign Affairs to our Ambassador in Berlin, who had suddenly developed an extraordinary sense of the sacredness of the Treaty of London, dated 1839, and still, as it happened, inviolate among the torn fragments of many subsequent and similar "scraps of paper." Our Ambassador seems to have been of Sir Maurice's opinion that there could be no such tearing hurry. The Germans could enter France through the line of forts between Verdun and Toul if they were really too flustered to wait a few days on the chance of Sir Edward Grey's persuasive conversation and charming character softening Russia and bringing Austria to conviction of sin. Thereupon the Imperial Chancellor, not being quite an angel, asked whether we had counted the cost of crossing the path of an Empire fighting for its life (for these Militarist statesmen do really believe that nations can be killed by cannon shot). That was a threat; and as we cared nothing about Germany's peril, and wouldn't stand being threatened any more by a Power of which we now had the inside grip, the fat remained in the fire, blazing more fiercely than ever. There was only one end possible to such a clash of high tempers, national egotisms, and reciprocal ignorances.

Delicate Position of Mr. Asquith.

It seemed a splendid chance for the Government to place itself at the head of the nation. But no British Government within my recollection has ever understood the nation. Mr. Asquith, true to the Gladstonian tradition (hardly just to Gladstone, by the way) that a Liberal Prime Minister should know nothing concerning foreign politics and care less, and calmly insensible to the real nature of the popular explosion, fell back on 1839, picking up the obvious barrister's point about the violation of the neutrality of Belgium, and tried the equally obvious barrister's claptrap about "an infamous proposal" on the jury. He assured us that nobody could have done more for peace than Sir Edward Grey, though the rush to smash the Kaiser was the most popular thing Sir Edward had ever done.

Besides, there was another difficulty. Mr. Asquith himself, though serenely persuaded that he is a Liberal statesman, is, in effect, very much what the Kaiser would have been if he had been a Yorkshireman and a lawyer instead of being only half English and the other half Hohenzollern, and an anointed emperor to boot. As far as popular liberties are concerned, History will make no distinction between Mr. Asquith and Metternich. He is forced to keep on the safe academic ground of Belgium by the very obvious consideration that if he began to talk of the Kaiser's imprisonments of editors and democratic agitators and so forth, a Homeric laughter, punctuated with cries of, "How about Denshawai?" "What price Tom Mann?" "Votes for women!" "Been in India lately?" "Make McKenna Kaiser," "Or dear old Herbert Gladstone," etc., etc., would promptly spoil that pose. The plain fact is that, Militarism apart, Germany is in many ways more democratic in practice than England: indeed the Kaiser has been openly reviled as a coward by his Junkers because he falls short of Mr. Asquith in calm indifference to Liberal principles and blank ignorance of working-class sympathies, opinions, and interests.

Mr. Asquith had also to distract public attention from the fact that three official members of his Government, all men of unquestioned and conspicuous patriotism and intellectual honesty, walked straight out into private life on the declaration of war. One of them, Mr. John Burns, did so at an enormous personal sacrifice, and has since maintained a grim silence far more eloquent than the famous speech Germany invented for him. It is not generally believed that these three statesmen were actuated by a passion for the violation of Belgian neutrality.

On the whole, it was impossible for the Government to seize its grand chance and put itself at the head of the popular movement that responded to Sir Edward Grey's declaration: the very simple reason being that the Government does not represent the nation, and is in its sympathies just as much a Junker government as the Kaiser's. And so, what the Government cannot do has to be done by unofficial persons with clean and brilliant anti-Junker records like Mr. Wells, Mr. Arnold Bennett, Mr. Neil Lyons, and Mr. Jerome K. Jerome. Neither Mr. Asquith nor Sir Edward Grey can grasp, as these real spokesmen of their time do, the fact that we just simply want to put an end to Potsdamnation, both at home and abroad. Both of them probably think Potsdam a very fine and enviable institution, and want England to out-Potsdam Potsdam and to monopolize the command of the seas: a monstrous aspiration. We, I take it, want to guarantee that command of the sea which is the common heritage of mankind to the tiniest State and the humblest fisherman that depends on the sea for a livelihood. We want the North Sea to be as safe for everybody, English or German, as Portland Place.

The Need for Recrimination.

And now somebody who would rather I had not said all this (having probably talked dreadful nonsense about Belgium and so forth for a month past) is sure to ask: "Why all this recrimination? What is done is done. Is it not now the duty of every Englishman to sink all differences in the face of the common peril?" etc., etc. To all such prayers to be shielded from that terrible thing, the truth, I must reply that history consists mainly of recrimination, and that I am writing history because an accurate knowledge of what has occurred is not only indispensable to any sort of reasonable behaviour on our part in the face of Europe when the inevitable day of settlement comes, but because it has a practical bearing on the most perilously urgent and immediate business before us: the business of the appeal to the nation for recruits and for enormous sums of money. It has to decide the question whether that appeal shall be addressed frankly to our love of freedom, and our tradition (none the less noble and moving because it is so hard to reconcile with the diplomatic facts) that England is a guardian of the world's liberty, and not to bad law about an obsolete treaty, and cant about the diabolical personal disposition of the Kaiser, and the wounded propriety of a peace-loving England, and all the rest of the slosh and tosh that has been making John Bull sick for months past. No doubt at first, when we were all clasping one another's hands very hard and begging one another not to be afraid, almost anything was excusable. Even the war notes of Mr. Garvin, which stood out as the notes of a gentleman amid a welter of scurrilous rubbish and a rather blackguardly Punch cartoon mocking the agony of Berlin (Punch having turned its non-interventionist coat very promptly), had sometimes to run: "We know absolutely nothing of what is happening at the front, except that the heroism of the British troops will thrill the ages to the last syllable of recorded time," or words to that effect. But now it is time to pull ourselves together; to feel our muscle; to realize the value of our strength and pluck; and to tell the truth unashamed like men of courage and character, not to shirk it like the official apologists of a Foreign Office plot.

What Germany Should Have Done.

And first, as I despise critics who put people in the wrong without being able to set them right, I shall, before I go any further with my criticism of our official position, do the Government and the Foreign Office the service of finding a correct official position for them; for I admit that the popular position, though sound as far as it goes, is too crude for official use. This correct official position can be found only by considering what Germany should have done, and might have done had she not been, like our own Junkers, so fascinated by the Militarist craze, and obsessed by the chronic Militarist panic, that she was "in too great a hurry to bid the devil good morning." The matter is simple enough: she should have entrusted the security of her western frontier to the public opinion of the west of Europe and to America, and fought Russia, if attacked, with her rear not otherwise defended. The Militarist theory is that we, France and England, would have immediately sprung at her from behind; but that is just how the Militarist theory gets its votaries into trouble by assuming that Europe is a chess board. Europe is not a chess board; but a populous continent in which only a very few people are engaged in military chess; and even those few have many other things to consider besides capturing their adversary's king. Not only would it have been impossible for England to have attacked Germany under such circumstances; but if France had done so England could not have assisted her, and might even have been compelled by public opinion to intervene by way of a joint protest from England and America, or even by arms, on her behalf if she were murderously pressed on both flanks. Even our Militarists and diplomatists would have had reasons for such an intervention. An aggressive Franco-Russian hegemony, if it crushed Germany, would be quite as disagreeable to us as a German one. Thus Germany would at worst have been fighting Russia and France with the sympathy of all the other Powers, and a chance of active assistance from some of them, especially those who share her hostility to the Russian Government. Had France not attacked her—and though I am as ignorant of the terms of the Franco-Russian alliance as Sir Edward Grey is strangely content to be, I cannot see how the French Government could have justified to its own people a fearfully dangerous attack on Germany had Russia been the aggressor—Germany would have secured fair play for her fight with Russia. But even the fight with Russia was not inevitable. The ultimatum to Servia was the escapade of a dotard: a worse crime than the assassination that provoked it. There is no reason to doubt the conclusion in Sir Maurice de Bunsen's despatch (No. 161) that it could have been got over, and that Russia and Austria would have thought better of fighting and come to terms. Peace was really on the cards; and the sane game was to play for it.

The Achilles Heel of Militarism.

Instead, Germany flew at France's throat, and by incidentally invading Belgium gave us the excuse our Militarists wanted to attack her with the full sympathy of the nation. Why did she do this stupid thing? Not because of the counsels of General von Bernhardi. On the contrary, he had warned her expressly against allowing herself to be caught between Russia and a Franco-British combination until she had formed a counterbalancing alliance with America, Italy, and Turkey. And he had most certainly not encouraged her to depend on England sparing her: on the contrary, he could not sufficiently admire the wily ruthlessness with which England watches her opportunity and springs at her foe when the foe is down. (He little knew, poor man, how much he was flattering our capacity for Realpolitik!) But he had reckoned without his creed's fatal and fundamental weakness, which is, that as Junker-Militarism promotes only stupid people and snobs, and suppresses genuine realists as if they were snakes, it always turns out when a crisis arrives that "the silly people don't know their own silly business." The Kaiser and his ministers made an appalling mess of their job. They were inflamed by Bernhardi; but they did not understand him. They swallowed his flattery, but did not take in his strategy or his warnings. They knew that when the moment came to face the Franco-Russian alliance, they were to make a magnificent dash at France and sweep her pieces off the great chess board before the Russians had time to mobilize; and then return and crush Russia, leaving the conquest of England for another day. This was honestly as much as their heads could hold at one time; and they were helplessly unable to consider whether the other conditions postulated by Bernhardi were present, or indeed, in the excitement of their schoolboyish imaginations, to remember whether he had postulated any at all. And so they made their dash and put themselves in the wrong at every point morally, besides making victory humanly impossible for themselves militarily. That is the nemesis of Militarism: the Militarist is thrown into a big game which he is too stupid to be able to play successfully. Philip of Spain tried it 300 years ago; and the ruin he brought on his empire has lasted to this day. He was so stupid that though he believed himself to be the chosen instrument of God (as sure a sign of a hopeless fool in a man who cannot see that every other man is equally an instrument of that Power as it is a guarantee of wisdom and goodwill in the man who respects his neighbor as himself) he attempted to fight Drake on the assumption that a cannon was a weapon that no real gentleman and good Catholic would condescend to handle. Louis XIV. tried again two centuries ago, and, being a more frivolous fool, got beaten by Marlborough and sent his great-grandson from the throne to the guillotine. Napoleon tried it 100 years ago. He was more dangerous, because he had prodigious personal ability and technical military skill; and he started with the magnificent credential of the French Revolution. All that carried him farther than the Spanish bigot or the French fop; but he, too, accreted fools and knaves, and ended defeated in St. Helena after pandering for twenty years to the appetite of idiots for glory and bloodshed; waging war as "a great game"; and finding in a field strewn with corpses "un beau spectacle." In short, as strong a magnet to fools as the others, though so much abler.

Our Own True Position.

Now comes the question, in what position did this result of a mad theory and a hopelessly incompetent application of it on the part of Potsdam place our own Government? It left us quite clearly in the position of the responsible policeman of the west. There was nobody else in Europe strong enough to chain "the mad dog." Belgium and Holland, Norway and Sweden, Denmark and Switzerland could hardly have been expected to take that duty on themselves, even if Norway and Sweden had not good reason to be anti-Russian, and the Dutch capitalists were not half convinced that their commercial prosperity would be greater under German than under native rule. It will not be contended that Spain could have done anything; and as to Italy, it was doubtful whether she did not consider herself still a member of the Triple Alliance. It was evidently England or nobody. For England to have refrained from hurling herself into the fray, horse, foot, and artillery, was impossible from every point of view. From the democratic point of view it would have meant an acceptance of the pretension of which Potsdam, by attacking the French Republic, had made itself the champion: that is, the pretension of the Junker class to dispose of the world on Militarist lines at the expense of the lives and limbs of the masses. From the international Socialist point of view, it would have been the acceptance of the extreme nationalist view that the people of other countries are foreigners, and that it does not concern us if they choose to cut one another's throats. Our Militarist Junkers cried "If we let Germany conquer France it will be our turn next." Our romantic Junkers added "and serve us right too: what man will pity us when the hour strikes for us, if we skulk now?" Even the wise, who loathe war, and regard it as such a dishonour and disgrace in itself that all its laurels cannot hide its brand of Cain, had to admit that police duty is necessary and that war must be made on such war as the Germans had made by attacking France in an avowed attempt to substitute a hegemony of cannon for the comity of nations. There was no alternative. Had the Foreign Office been the International Socialist Bureau, had Sir Edward Grey been Jaures, had Mr. Ramsay MacDonald been Prime Minister, had Russia been Germany's ally instead of ours, the result would still have been the same: we must have drawn the sword to save France and smash Potsdam as we smashed and always must smash Philip, Louis, Napoleon, et hoc genus omne.

The case for our action is thus as complete as any casus belli is ever likely to be. In fact its double character as both a democratic and military (if not Militarist) case makes it too complete; for it enables our Junkers to claim it entirely for themselves, and to fake it with pseudo-legal justifications which destroy nine-tenths of our credit, the military and legal cases being hardly a tenth of the whole: indeed, they would not by themselves justify the slaughter of a single Pomeranian grenadier. For instance, take the Militarist view that we must fight Potsdam because if the Kaiser is victorious, it will be our turn next! Well: are we not prepared to fight always when our turn comes? Why should not we also depend on our navy, on the extreme improbability of Germany, however triumphant, making two such terrible calls on her people in the same generation as a war involves, on the sympathy of the defeated, and on the support of American and European public opinion when our turn comes, if there is nothing at stake now but the difference between defeat and victory in an otherwise indifferent military campaign? If the welfare of the world does not suffer any more by an English than by a German defeat who cares whether we are defeated or not? As mere competitors in a race of armaments and an Olympic game conducted with ball cartridge, or as plaintiffs in a technical case of international law (already decided against us in 1870, by the way, when Gladstone had to resort to a new treaty made ad hoc and lapsing at the end of the war) we might as well be beaten as not, for all the harm that will ensue to anyone but ourselves, or even to ourselves apart from our national vanity. It is as the special constables of European life that we are important, and can send our men to the trenches with the assurance that they are fighting in a worthy cause. In short, the Junker case is not worth twopence: the Democratic case, the Socialist case, the International case is worth all it threatens to cost.

The German Defence to Our Indictment.

What is the German reply to this case? Or rather, how would the Germans reply to it if their official Militarist and Kaiserist panjandrums had the wit to find the effective reply? Undoubtedly they would say that our Social-Democratic professions are all very fine, but that our conversion to them is suspiciously sudden and recent. They would remark that it is a little difficult for a nation in deadly peril to trust its existence to a foreign public opinion which has not only never been expressed by the people who really control England's foreign policy, but is flatly opposed to all their known views and prejudices. They would ask why, instead of making an Entente with France and Russia and refusing to give Germany any assurance concerning its object except that we would not pledge ourselves to remain neutral if the Franco-Russian Entente fell on Germany, we did not say straight out in 1912 (when they put the question flatly to us), and again last July when Sazonoff urged us so strongly to shew our hand, that if Germany attacked France we should fight her, Russia or no Russia (a far less irritating and provocative attitude), although we knew full well that an attack on France through Belgium would be part of the German program if the Russian peril became acute. They would point out that if our own Secretary for Foreign Affairs openly disclaimed any knowledge of the terms of the Franco-Russian alliance, it was hard for a German to believe that they were wholly fit for publication. In short, they would say "If you were so jolly wise and well intentioned before the event, why did not your Foreign Minister and your ambassadors in Berlin and Vienna and St. Petersburg—we beg pardon, Petrograd—invite us to keep the peace and rely on western public opinion instead of refusing us every pledge except the hostile one to co-operate with France against us in the North Sea, and making it only too plain to us that your policy was a Junker policy as much as ours, and that we had nothing to hope from your good-will? What evidence had we that you were playing any other game than this Militarist chess of our own, which you now so piously renounce, but which none of you except a handful of Socialists whom you despise and Syndicalists whom you imprison on Militarist pretexts has opposed for years past, though it has been all over your Militarist anti-German platforms and papers and magazines? Are your Social-Democratic principles sincere, or are they only a dagger you keep up your sleeve to stab us in the back when our two most formidable foes are trying to garotte us? If so, where does your moral superiority come in, hypocrites that you are? If not, why, we repeat, did you not make them known to all the world, instead of making an ambush for us by your senseless silence?"

I see no reply to that except a frank confession that we did not know our own minds; that we came to a knowledge of them only when Germany's attack on France forced us to make them up at last; that though doubtless a chronic state of perfect lucidity and long prevision on our part would have been highly convenient, yet there is a good deal to be said for the policy of not fording a stream until you come to it; and that in any case we must entirely decline to admit that we are more likely than other people to do the wrong thing when circumstances at last oblige us to think and act. Also that the discussion is idle on the shewing of the German case itself; for whether the Germans assumed us to be unscrupulous Militarists or conscientious Democrats they were bound to come to the same conclusion: namely, that we should attack them if they attacked France; consequently their assumption that we would not interfere must have been based on the belief that we are simply "contemptible," which is the sort of mistake people have to pay for in this wicked world.

On the whole, we can hector our war in the Prussian manner out of that discussion well enough, provided we hold our own in the field. But the Prussian manner hardly satisfies the conscience. True, the fact that our diplomatists were not able to discover the right course for Germany does not excuse Germany for being unable to find it for herself. Not that it was more her business than ours: it was a European question, and should have been solved by the united counsels of all the ambassadors and Foreign Offices and chanceries. Indeed it could not have been stably solved without certain assurances from them. But it was, to say the least, as much Germany's business as anyone else's, and terribly urgent for her: "a matter of life and death," the Imperial Chancellor thought. Still, it is not for us to claim moral superiority to Germany. It was for us a matter of the life and death of many Englishmen; and these Englishmen are dead because our diplomatists were as blind as the Prussians. The war is a failure for secret Junker diplomacy, ours no less than the enemy's. Those of us who have still to die must be inspired, not by devotion to the diplomatists, but, like the Socialist hero of old on the barricade, by the vision of "human solidarity." And if he purchases victory for that holy cause with his blood, I submit that we cannot decently allow the Foreign Office to hang up his martyr's palm over the War Office Mantelpiece.

The First Penalty of Disingenuousness.

The Foreign Office, however, can at least shift its ground, and declare for the good cause instead of belittling it with quibbling excuses. For see what the first effect of the nonsense about Belgium has been! It carried with it the inevitable conclusion that when the last German was cleared off Belgian soil, peace-loving England, her reluctant work in this shocking war done, would calmly retire from the conflict, and leave her Allies to finish the deal with Potsdam. Accordingly, after Mr. Asquith's oration at the Mansion House, the Allies very properly insisted on our signing a solemn treaty between the parties that they must all stand together to the very end. A pitifully thin attempt has been made to represent that the mistrusted party was France, and that the Kaiser was trying to buy her off. All one can say to that is that the people who believe that any French Government dare face the French people now with anything less than Alsace and Lorraine as the price of peace, or that an undefeated and indeed masterfully advancing German Kaiser (as he seemed then) dare offer France such a price, would believe anything. Of course we had to sign; but if the Prime Minister had not been prevented by his own past from taking the popular line, we should not have been suspected of a possible backing-out when the demands of our sanctimoniousness were satisfied. He would have known that we are not vindicating a treaty which by accident remains among the fragments of treaties of Paris, of Prague, of Berlin, of all sorts of places and dates, as the only European treaty that has hitherto escaped flat violation: we are supporting the war as a war on war, on military coercion, on domineering, on bullying, on brute force, on military law, on caste insolence, on what Mrs. Fawcett called insensate devilry (only to find the papers explaining apologetically that she, as a lady, had of course been alluding to war made by foreigners, not by England). Some of us, remembering the things we have ourselves said and done, may doubt whether Satan can cast out Satan; but as the job is not exactly one for an unfallen angel, we may as well let him have a try.

The Blank Cheque.

In the meantime behold us again hopelessly outwitted by Eastern diplomacy as a direct consequence of this ill-starred outburst of hypocrisy about treaties! Everybody has said over and over again that this war is the most tremendous war ever waged. Nobody has said that this new treaty is the most tremendous blank cheque we have ever been forced to sign by our Parliamentary party trick of striking moral attitudes. It is true that Mr. J. A. Hobson realised the situation at once, and was allowed to utter a little croak in a corner; but where was the trumpet note of warning that should have rung throughout the whole Press? Just consider what the blank cheque means. France's draft on it may stop at the cost of recovering Alsace and Lorraine. We shall have to be content with a few scraps of German colony and the heavy-weight championship. But Russia? When will she say "Hold! Enough!" Suppose she wants not only Poland, but Baltic Prussia? Suppose she wants Constantinople as her port of access to the unfrozen seas, in addition to the dismemberment of Austria? Suppose she has the brilliant idea of annexing all Prussia, for which there is really something to be said by ethnographical map-makers, Militarist madmen, and Pan-Slavist megalomaniacs? It may be a reasonable order; but it is a large one; and the fact that we should have been committed to it without the knowledge of Parliament, without discussion, without warning, without any sort of appeal to public opinion or democratic sanction, by a stroke of Sir Edward Grey's pen within five weeks of his having committed us in the same fashion to an appalling European war, shews how completely the Foreign Office has thrown away all pretence of being any less absolute than the Kaiser himself. It simply offers carte blanche to the armies of the Allies without a word to the nation until the cheque is signed. The only limit there is to the obligation is the certainty that the cheque will be dishonoured the moment the draft on it becomes too heavy. And that may furnish a virtuous pretext for another war between the Allies themselves. In any case no treaty can save each Ally from the brute necessity of surrendering and paying up if beaten, whether the defeat is shared by the others or not. Did I not say that the sooner we made up our minds to the terms of the treaty of peace, so that we might know what we were fighting for, and how far we were bound to go, the better? Instead of which we sign a ridiculous "scrap of paper" to save ourselves the intolerable fatigue of thought.

Belgium Crucified Between the European Powers.

And now, before I leave the subject of Belgium, what have we done for Belgium? Have we saved her soil from invasion? Were we at her side with half a million men when the avalanche fell on her? Or were we safe in our own country praising her heroism in paragraphs which all contrived to convey an idea that the Belgian soldier is about four feet high, but immensely plucky for his size? Alas, when the Belgian soldier cried: "Where are the English?" the reply was "a mass of concrete as large as a big room," blown into the air by a German siege gun, falling back and crushing him into the earth we had not succeeded in saving from the worst of the horrors of war. We have not protected Belgium: Belgium has protected us at the cost of being conquered by Germany. It is now our sacred duty to drive the Germans out of Belgium. Meanwhile we might at least rescue her refugees by a generous grant of public money from the caprices of private charity. We need not press our offer to lend her money: German capitalists will do that for her with the greatest pleasure when the war is over. I think the Government realizes that now; for I note the after-thought that a loan from us need not bear interest.

Now that we begin to see where we really are, what practical morals can we draw?

Unpreparedness the Price of Secrecy.

First, that our autocratic foreign policy, in which the Secretary for Foreign Affairs is always a Junker, and makes war and concludes war without consulting the nation, or confiding in it, or even refraining from deceiving it as to his intentions, leads inevitably to a disastrous combination of war and unpreparedness for war. Wars are planned which require huge expeditionary armies trained and equipped for war. But as such preparation could not be concealed from the public, it is simply deferred until the war is actually declared and begun, at the most frightful risk of such an annihilation of our little peace army as we escaped by the skin of our teeth at Mons and Cambrai. The military experts tell us that it takes four months to make an infantry and six to make a cavalry soldier. And our way of getting an army able to fight the German army is to declare war on Germany just as if we had such an army, and then trust to the appalling resultant peril and disaster to drive us into wholesale enlistment, voluntary or (better still from the Junker point of view) compulsory. It seems to me that a nation which tolerates such insensate methods and outrageous risks must shortly perish from sheer lunacy. And it is all pure superstition: the retaining of the methods of Edward the First in the reign of George the Fifth. I therefore suggest that the first lesson of the war is that the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs be reduced to the level of a simple Prime Minister, or even of a constitutional monarch, powerless to fire a single shot or sign a treaty without the authority of the House of Commons, all diplomatic business being conducted in a blaze of publicity, and the present regulation which exacts the qualification of a private income of at least £400 a year for a position in the Diplomatic Service replaced by a new regulation that at least half the staff shall consist of persons who have never dined out at the houses of hosts of higher rank than unfashionable solicitors or doctors.

In these recommendations I am not forgetting that an effective check on diplomacy is not easy to devize, and that high personal character and class disinterestedness (the latter at present unattainable) on the part of our diplomatists will be as vital as ever. I well know that diplomacy is carried on at present not only by official correspondence meant for possible publication and subject to an inspection which is in some degree a responsible inspection, but by private letters which the King himself has no right to read. I know that even in the United States, where treaties and declarations of war must be made by Parliament, it is nevertheless possible for the President to bring about a situation in which Congress, like our House of Commons in the present instance, has no alternative but to declare war. But though complete security is impracticable, it does not follow that no precautions should be taken, or that a democratic tradition is no safer than a feudal tradition. A far graver doubt is raised by the susceptibility of the masses to war fever, and the appalling danger of a daily deluge of cheap newspapers written by nameless men and women whose scandalously low payment is a guarantee of their ignorance and their servility to the financial department, controlled by a moneyed class which not only curries favour with the military caste for social reasons, but has large direct interests in war as a method of raising the price of money, the only commodity the moneyed class has to sell. But I am quite unable to see that our Junkers are less susceptible to the influence of the Press than the people educated by public elementary schools. On the contrary, our Democrats are more foolproof than our Plutocrats; and the ravings our Junkers send to the papers for nothing in war time would be dear at a halfpenny a line. Plutocracy makes for war because it offers prizes to Plutocrats: Socialism makes for peace because the interests it serves are international. So, as the Socialist side is the democratic side, we had better democratize our diplomacy if we desire peace.

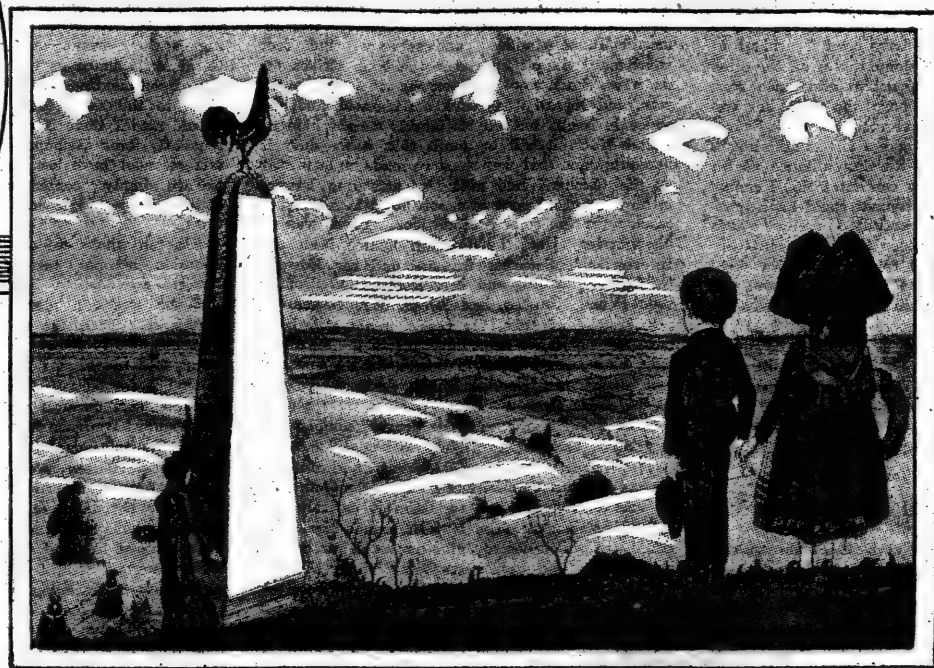
JAILED FOR ONE ANTI-GERMAN BOOK, WRITES ANOTHER

"Hansi," Famous Alsatian Artist and Writer, Whose "Mon Village" Caused His Arrest, Has Set Forth Alsace's History in Text and Pictures by No Means Calculated to Please the Land's Teutonic Masters.



Alsatian Children Dreaming of the Glories of France.

"Hansi's" Conception of the First Germanic Invaders of Alsace.

NOT long ago a mild sensation was created when Jacob Waltz, an Alsatian artist and writer, widely known under the pseudonym of "Hansi," was condemned by the German authorities to a year's imprisonment on account of a book for children which he had written and illustrated. In this book, which was called "Mon Village," he dealt in a humorous and satirical vein with life in his native village, and he was lavish both with pen and pencil in criticism of the German masters of Alsace-Lorraine and praise of the French, its rulers of yesterday.

Since then "Hansi" has produced another work, which, together with its predecessor, has become so enormously popular in France since the outbreak of war against Germany that copies are scarcely to be obtained. This, "The History of Alsace for Little Children, Told by Their Uncle Hansi," gives little Alsatians a survey of the story of their native land that is anti-German in every line. Over and over again they are warned not to believe what their "Herr Professor" tells them in school, not to forget that Alsace is and always will be French, that the Germans are barbarous interlopers and oppressors. From the earliest days, long before the Romans, the men from across the Rhine are pictured as savages, always ravaging and burning the fair fields and towns of Alsace, always coveting its wealth, until finally in the "terrible year" of 1870 they crowned all their misdeeds by annexing the province to their alien empire.

And while this book and "Mon Village" are selling like hot cakes in France and doubtless being smuggled into Alsatian homes by the hundred, there to be scanned with delight spiced with the thought of what may befall if "the men from across the Rhine" get wind of the treasured volumes, "Hansi" himself is fighting in the French Army against the nation which he has so consistently and humorously criticised in word and picture.

Why He Wrote It.

"The History of Alsace," a few copies of which have reached America, has a preface headed "Why I Have Written This Book," in which "Hansi" says:

My sojourn at the German school at Colmar is one of the worst memories of my life. The stupid monotony of the lessons of Greek and Latin, the hardships of the course in German, with its insipid patriotic poems with which we were saturated, the insults by which our teacher revenged himself for our grins when he imagined that he was teaching us French, all this sort of thing poisons the childhood of little Alsatians. But all these sorrows, all these humiliations, even the slaps, the stinging slaps, which left the blush of shame on one's brow and on one's cheek the mark from the "Herr Professor's" big ring, all this was as nothing compared to what we suffered during the history lesson.

There above all they tried to Germanise us by heaping sarcasm and insult on all that was dear to us, while forcing us at the same time to learn the history of Prussia, the history of a people foreign to us. Oh, how little were we interested in all those Electors of Brandenburg, in Otto the Lazy and Albert the Bear, whose slightest gesture we had to know! How gloomy and sad is the story of their empire where there was never a place for us!

But in spite of all we waited impatiently for the time when we should reach the wars of the Revolution and the Empire, because then, certainly, the teacher would be obliged despite himself to render justice to the sons of France and Alsace. Alas! that moment never came; as if by accident the epoch in history which interested us most coincided always with our vacations. And when we returned, if it happened that we were finished with the Margraves of Brandenburg, it was the terrible year which took their place on our programme of studies.

With what cruel joy, with what malicious laughter would the dullard who thought he was Germanizing us pour forth his sneering jokes. At each lesson we were forced to hear repeated, amid the rude laughter of the little German pupils, that the French were liars and cowards, that they always ran like hares, that "the people of the lords of creation" had made them bite the dust and bend the knee. Little French children, lucky enough to learn history from one of their own nation knew nothing of the suffering which one undergoes when obliged to listen to such things without being able to reply.

Alas, I was too small to reply and now I am too big to box old man on the ear! But I vowed to be revenged later on by writing the book which every one of us wished to have, the history of Alsace for little children. I have told that history here as best I could, just as it happened, and you will see that it is slightly different from and probably less boresome than history seen through gold-rimmed German spectacles.

I hope that my book will arouse in you the wish to learn more of our past. the more you know of it the better you will understand why our new fellow-countrymen fear the persistence and growth among us of our devotion to the past. They know that it is there that we find both examples of pride and courage and the fortitude to hope for better things in the future.

As to little French children, I feel that they will be pleased to learn the history of a land that was French for so long, just as one likes to know the history of a friend. And if my book gives to Alsace and the Alsatians a few more friends I shall be amply rewarded.

"Wotan Mit Uns."

Thereupon "Hansi" takes up the history of Alsace in the remotest times, when the inhabitants were just learning to clear away the forests and till the fertile soil bordering on the Rhine. "The Alsatians of those days," he writes, "led a rude and dangerous life, but they were free. Their women were beautiful, and loved to deck themselves in bright-colored raiment and fine jewels."

But not so the Germans on the other side of the great river, he continues. Their heads were covered with badly combed hair, "just as today," and they had great matted beards. In one thing, however, the Alsatian author declares, they were better than their descendants—they did not wear glasses.

"Hansi" solemnly adjures little Alsatians thus:

It was the Rhine which separated the two peoples, between whom there was so great a difference. Remember this carefully, because later on when you are in school they will try to make you believe that the lands of the Germans stretched as far as the Vosges. That is not true; the greatest savants have given us proof of this. Repeat this over and over again to your little Alsatian playmates at recess, but do not contradict the "Herr Professor" in class. For I, when I was little, was kept after school three hours because I refused to believe it.

"Hansi" tells how the savage Germans used to stand on the other side of the great stream and look covetously at the rich, well-tilled fields of Alsace, so different from their own wild domain. One of his most amusing pictures shows a trio of these Teutons of thousands of years ago, clad in skins and armed with stone hatchets and spears, but with one bearing something unmistakably like the spiked helmet of the German Army of today, and another the motto "Wotan Mit Uns," reminiscent of one of Germany's present-day slogans.

Eventually, he says, hordes of these people got across the Rhine and fell upon Alsace with savage fury, beginning a series of invasions which have continued down to the present day. "All the evil that has ever befallen Alsace came from across the Rhine," remarks "Hansi."

He tells, then, how Julius Caesar marched into Alsace from Gaul and inflicted a terrible defeat on the German hordes of Ariovistus:

But it was in vain that they killed a huge number of the foe. The red-haired giants of Ariovistus would not fall. Their feet were so large that, even when after they were dead, they continued to stand erect, so that the Romans had to push them over after killing them. Only then was the line broken and the survivors put to flight.

There followed golden days for Alsace. The Romans governed wisely, and did not try to force their customs on the Alsatians. But, possessing a superior brand of civilization, their new subjects soon assimilated it. And "Hansi" does not lose his chance here to dig at the Germans again. "When one nation has conquered another," he writes, "it can impose its civilization upon the conquered only if it is more civilized than they are."

Under the beneficent Roman rule all Alsace prospered, and the pillaging Germans were overawed by fortified towns along the Rhine, always ready to repel them when they summoned up courage to cross the stream. One of these forts, says "Hansi," was Strassburg, and he adds: "Remember this, children, so that when you are told that it is an old German town you may be able to smile at the thought that originally this place was founded for the purpose of repelling the Germans."

Vandals, Old and New.

After a while the Roman hold on the world began to weaken, the valiant legionaries were withdrawn from Alsace to force back barbarians on other frontiers of the vast empire, and the fair land lay once more at the mercy of the men from across the Rhine. They were not slow in taking advantage of this. Huge hordes of them crossed the river in the dead of Winter, when its surface was frozen hard, and they who had lived so long in peace and happiness, knew again all the terrors of a German invasion. Among these new barbarians, "Hansi" tells us, was one tribe called the Vandals, "a very German tribe," who had not until then visited Alsace. He writes:

They were past masters in the art of devastation; they destroyed every monument which they found on their road. And to this very day there are descendants of these Vandals. Usually they are appointed German Government architects.

Some of them completely destroy all monuments dating from the French era; the others are satisfied with adding to chateaus little turrets, pointed roofs, zinc weather vanes, or electric lights. They also daub churches with yellow, blue, or purple. This is a little less expensive than the work of their ancestors, but it amounts to about the same thing.

"Hansi" next takes up the invasion of the Huns under Attila, whom he describes as "a being as much monkey as man, with huge arms and eyes as cruel and ferocious as those of a Pan-Germanist."

Then came the days when Alsace was a part of the great Holy Roman Empire, whose rulers, according to the Alsatian author, were extremely lax in protecting their Alsatian subjects from aggression and by no means won the affection of the latter nor succeeded in Germanizing them, despite the assertions of German historians.

French at Last.

And then, after tales of pillage and battle, of terrible ravages by German banditti and equally savage reprisals by exasperated Alsatian burghers, gloom is suddenly dispelled from text and pictures, and, on pages brilliant with highly colored marginal decorations and humorous delineations of German discomfiture in battle, "Hansi" writes:

After all these sorrows I am happy to be able at last to tell you something more amusing. It is an ill-wind that blows nobody good, because, at the end of these long wars, Alsace was to become French.

He goes on to tell how the great Marshal Turenne crossed the Vosges with a French army, playing with his Russian and other German opponents as a cat plays with a mouse, until finally he fell upon them with the utmost fury close to the old town of Türckheim.

They had thrown up intrenchments; Turenne smashed everything. At the same time a French corps which had made a rapid march over the mountains suddenly deployed and attacked the rearguard of the enemy.

There followed an awful panic. On that day the Germans ran like hares, to use the expression so beloved by our teacher when he alluded to the French. The Imperial troops were in such a hurry that they did not even stop to announce their sudden departure to their Prussian friends, and when these saw in the middle of the night that they were alone they set out at top speed along the road to Strassburg and did not stop till they were back across the Rhine.

For a long time our people talked about that memorable battle of Türckheim. When a short time afterward Turenne was killed in the enemy's country all Alsace mourned for the great leader whose last thoughts were of our land.

When his will was opened this was found written there: "No French soldier must rest as long as there is a German in Alsace!"

Rout of the Germans by the French Under Turenne at Turckheim, in Alsace as Pictured by "Hansi".

"Hansi" informs those for whom he writes, the little Alsatian children, that in the German schools to which they are obliged to go they will hear a great deal about Louis XIV.'s "seizure" of Alsace. He adds:

As he speaks these words the good Herr Professor will raise his eyes to the ceiling and then he will wipe his eyeglasses and make a face as if the fourteenth Louis had committed a frightful crime, a crime of which the worthy son of those who bombarded Strassburg cannot speak without having indignation stifle his voice.

But there was no such seizure, declares "Hansi." Long before Turenne's victories Alsatians had asked France to make them French.

Yes, asked to become French. I might put on my nose all the gold-rimmed spectacles in Germany without being able to find in all history one single instance where an Alsatian asked of his own free will that he be allowed to become a German.

He goes on to say that thirty-five years after the battle of Türckheim Alsace was so devotedly French that a Prussian Ambassador wrote to his King that it was a matter of common knowledge that the Alsatians were more French than the Parisians.

The era of French domination, "Hansi" tells his readers, was one of complete content and prosperity. King Louis XV. made a visit to his loyal city of Strassburg and was received with such pomp and rejoicing by the citizens that twenty years afterward people were still talking about the event. Artists, writers, and savants added to the glories of the land by their work, and, greatest achievement of all, an "Alsatian genius," the cook of the Marquis de Contades, invented that renowned delicacy, pâté de foie gras. This inspires "Hansi" to a wild, artistic outburst on the margin of one of his pages. There he shows Strassburg's world-famous delicacy, decorated with little flags, amid a riot of pretzels and gayly colored cakes.

Birth of the "Marseillaise."

Then came the French Revolution, and liberty-loving Alsace leaped to the van in the armies that tramped through Europe, shaking the thrones of Kings to their foundations. It was in Strassburg, as "Hansi" reminds his readers, that Rouget de Lisle composed the "Marseillaise"—the "Strassburgeise it should be called," says he—the song destined to become the national battle song of France. "Hansi" writes:

"That song cost us 500,000 men," said a German once, one who ought to know what he was talking about. In Alsace the Germans are still afraid of it, and we of the land which gave it birth are forbidden to sing it. But many Alsatians cannot obey this order, and their too retentive memories have cost them long weeks in prison.

Weight or Wait.

In the armies of Napoleon many brave Alsatians fought their way to fame, among them Kleber and Kellermann, names reverenced to this day by their fellow-countrymen. But there came a time when Napoleon, beset by countless foes, was beaten to his knees, and then once again "the men from across the Rhine" swept through lovely Alsace. For four long years, writes "Hansi," German soldiers gorged themselves on the abundant food of the Alsatians, until they grew so fat they could hardly move. One of his most amusing illustrations shows an officer posted close to a bridge across the Rhine, beside a huge scales on which German soldiers headed back to the Fatherland are being weighed.

Each is expected to tip the scales at two hundred pounds or more. If not, he is forbidden to return to his home in Germany, but must go back to where he was stationed in Alsace, there to make the inhabitants feed him up to the required weight.

At the end of the four years the Germans, stuffed full of good things, waddled laboriously over the Rhine, and Alsace was once more French.

More happy days! "Hansi" shows the welcome of the French King in a neat little Alsatian village, the first railway train puffing over a smiling landscape, French troops parading through a quaint gabled town surrounded by delighted youngsters. And then, without warning, we turn to a page on which a huge shadowy spiked helmet serves as a background for the text. We have reached "the terrible year."

Words and pictures now breathe death and horror and grief. "Hansi" tells of the German bombardment of Strassburg, of the heroic defense of the little garrison, of how the people of Baden over the Rhine used to come down to the river bank to see the bombs shriek through the air and buildings crumble or burst into flame, just as if they were spectators at an exhibition of fireworks.

Irreconcilable Foes.

He tells of the occupation of the province by the Germans after they had crushed French resistance, of their systematic attempts to Germanize the Alsatians, to stamp out their affection for France. But he does not fail to put touches of cheerfulness on the lugubrious pages that depict the new state of affairs. We see groups of gaunt, yellow-haired men and women, in strange, ill-fitting clothes, at whom Alsatians stare with broad smiles—the vanguard of the "Prussian invasion." "They want us to adopt their costume," sneers "Hansi." "All right, we will—on one day every year—Mardi Gras."

He concludes his history with these words:

During forty years nothing has changed in our land. Two peoples, two races, continue to live there together without ever mixing.

On the one hand is the Alsatian, proud of his inheritance, of his ancient civilization, above all of the sufferings he has endured; on the other hand, is the invader, noisy and full of arrogance, seeking under the pretext of Germanization to take possession of all the resources of the country, to impose upon it his customs, his language, and all that makes up his "Kultur." And that, as you know, my children, is something that will be forever impossible. * * *

Let us hope for better days, my children, because the future, do not forget, belongs to God, and not to the infamous man who presides over the Pan-Germanic League.

FACTS AND FANCIES

Another Horror of War.

TERRIBLE times, these!

The other day an innocent-eyed young lady, whose demeanor has always been sweet and gentle, went to a bookstore and returned with three volumes under her arm.

"What have you there?" she was asked by a male friend. Of course he expected for an answer the titles of three fluffy novels full of moonlight and love.

Instead the gentle young thing rattled off glibly:

"Oh, I've just bought 'Armies and Navies in the World War,' 'The Beginnings of the Great European Struggle,' and 'Battles of the War on Land and Sea.'"

"Ye gods!" gasped the man, and then under his breath: "Sherman was right."

Irrepressible.

YOU can't down wags. They get into the solemnest conversations. Even the great war over in Europe hasn't instilled reverence into them.

One was hovering on the outskirts of a war talk recently, wherein somebody said:

"What is the exact German for that toast which they have in the German Navy; you know what I mean—the one where they lift their glasses and drink to 'The Day!'?"

"'Der Tag!'" said the

"'Zum Tag!'" said another.

"'Dem Tag!'" said a third.

"I insist that they simply say 'Der Tag' when they drink," repeated the first man.

"No, that's the nominative case. It must be in the dative," objected one of the others. "There are a whole lot of declensions in German, you know, and Germans decline almost everything."

"Yes, but not a drink," interposed the wag.

They glared at him. But the solemn discussion was ruined.

Not Cabinet Size.

AN ex-Senator in Washington was talking one afternoon to a group of newly elected Congressmen about to be sworn in. "Be careful, boys," said he, "not to appear green. Think before you speak, and you'll not give yourselves away. I should hate to hear that any of you had acted as a new member from Arkansas once did.

"As soon as he reached Washington he went to a photographer's to be pictured for the papers.

"'I want my likeness taken,' said he.

"'Cabinet?' asked the photographer.

"The man from Arkansas reddened and looked pleased. 'No,' he replied, 'just plain, everyday Congressman.'"

Yes, Who?

IT has been argued back and forth that nobody knew that this war would break out. Well, if that is the case, who put the girls wise that the military cape would be the fashion this year?

PREPAREDNESS WITHOUT MILITARISM

By THEODORE ROOSEVELT

Seventh Article in His Series on What America Should Learn from the War

THE other day one of the typical ultra-pacificists or peace-at-any-price men put the ultra-pacificist case quite clearly, both in a statement of his own and by a quotation of what he called the "golden words" of Mr. Bryan at Mohonk. In arguing that we should under no conditions fight for our rights, and that we should make no preparation whatever to secure ourselves against wrong, this writer pointed out China as the proper model for America. He did this on the ground that China, which did not fight, was yet "older" than Rome, Greece and Germany, which had fought, and that its example was therefore to be preferred.

This, of course, is a position which saves the need of argument. If the average American wants to be a Chinaman, if China represents his ideal, then he should by all means follow the advice of pacificists like the writer in question and be a supporter of Mr. Bryan. If any man seriously believes that China has played a nobler and more useful part in the world than Athens and Rome and Germany, then he is quite right to try to Chinafy the United States.

In such event he must of course believe that all the culture, all the literature, all the art, all the political and cultural liberty and social well-being which modern Europe and the two Americas have inherited from Rome and Greece, and that all that has been done by Germany from the days of Charlemagne to the present time, represent mere error and confusion. He must believe that the average German or Frenchman or Englishman or inhabitant of North or South America occupies a lower moral, intellectual, and physical status than the average coolie who with his fellows composes the overwhelming majority of the Chinese population. To my mind such a proposition is unfit for debate outside of certain types of asylums. But those who sincerely take the view that this gentleman takes are unquestionably right in copying China in every detail, and nothing that I can say will appeal to them.

The "golden words" of Mr. Bryan were as follows:

"I believe that this nation could stand before the world today and tell the world that it did not believe in war, that it did not believe that it was the right way to settle disputes, that it had no disputes which it was not willing to submit to the judgment of the world. If this nation did that, it not only would not be attacked by any other nation on the earth, but it would become the supreme power in the world."

Of course, it is to be assumed that Mr. Bryan means what he says. If he does, then he is willing to submit to arbitration the question whether the Japanese have or have not the right to send unlimited numbers of immigrants to this shore. If Mr. Bryan does not mean this, among other specific things, then the "golden words" in question represent merely the emotionalism of the professional orator.

Of course, if Mr. Bryan means what he says, he also believes that we should not have interfered in Cuba and that Cuba ought now to be the property of Spain. He also believes that we ought to have permitted Colombia to reconquer and deprive of their independence the people of Panama, and that we should not have built the Panama Canal. He also believes that California and Texas ought now to be parts of Mexico, enjoying whatever blessings complete abstinence from foreign war has secured that country during the last three years. He also believes that the Declaration of Independence was an arbitrable matter and that the United States ought now to be a dependency of Great Britain. Unless Mr. Bryan does believe all these things, then his "golden words" represent only a rhetorical flourish. He is Secretary of State and the right hand man of President Wilson, and President Wilson is completely responsible for whatever he says and for the things he does, or rather which he leaves undone.

We Should Look Facts in the Face.

NOW, it is quite useless for me to write with any view to convince gentlemen like Mr. Bryan and the writer in question. If they really do represent our fellow-countrymen, then they are right in holding up China as our ideal, not the modern China, not the China that is changing and moving forward, but old China. In such event Americans ought frankly to class themselves with the Chinese. That is where, on this theory, they belong. If this is so, then let us fervently pray that the Japanese, or some other virile people that does not deify moral, mental and physical impotence, may speedily come to rule over us.

I am, however, writing on the assumption that Americans are still on the whole like their forefathers who followed Washington, and like their fathers who fought in the armies of Grant and Lee. I am writing on the assumption that even though temporarily misled they will not permanently and tamely submit to oppression, and that they will ultimately think intelligently as to what they should do to safeguard themselves against aggression. I abhor unjust war; and I deplore that the need even for just war should ever occur. I believe we should set our faces like flint against any policy of aggression by this country on the rights of any other country.

But I believe that we should look facts in the face. I believe that it is unworthy weakness to fear to face the truth. Moreover, I believe that we should have in us that fibre of manhood which will make us follow duty whithersoever it may lead. Unquestionably we should render all the service it is in our power to render to righteousness. To do this we must be able to back righteousness with force, to put might back of right. It may well be that by following out this theory we can in the end do our part in conjunction with other nations of the world to bring about, if not—as I hope—a world peace, yet at least a vital minimizing of the chances for war and of the areas of possible war. But meanwhile it is absolutely our duty to prepare for our own defense.

This country needs something like the Swiss system of war training for its young men. Switzerland is one of the most democratic Governments in the world, and it has given its young men such an efficient training as to insure entire preparedness for war, without suffering from the least touch of militarism. Switzerland is at peace now primarily because all the great military nations that surround it know that its people have no intention of making aggression on anybody and yet that they are thoroughly prepared to hold their own and are resolute to fight to the last against any invader who attempts either to subjugate their territory or by violating its neutrality to make it a battle-ground.

A Bishop of the Episcopal Church recently wrote me as follows: "How lamentable that we should stand idle, making no preparations to enforce peace, and crying 'Peace' when there is none! I have scant sympathy for the short-sightedness of those who decry preparation for war as a means of preventing it."

The manager of a land company in Alabama writes me urging that some one speak for reasonable preparedness on the part of the nation. He states that it is always possible that we shall be engaged in hostilities with some first class power, that he hopes and believes that war will never come, but adds:

Full Preparation Is Nation's Only Insurance.

I may not believe that my home will burn down, or that I am going to die within the period of my expectancy, but nevertheless I carry fire and life insurance to the full insurable value on my property and on my life to the extent of my ability. The only insurance of our liberties as a people is full preparation for a defense adequate against any attack and made in time to fully meet any attack. We do not know the attack is coming, but to wait until it does come will be too late.

"Our present weakness lies in the widespread opinion among our people that this country is invincible because of its large population and vast resources. This I believe is true if, and only if, we use these resources or a small part of them to protect the major part, and if we train at least a part of our people how to defend the nation. Under existing conditions we can hardly hope to have an effective army in the field in less time than eight or ten months. Today not 1 per cent. of our people know anything about rifle shooting."

I quote these two out of many letters, because they sum up the general feeling of men of vision. Both of my correspondents are most sincerely for peace. No man can possibly be more anxious for peace than I am, for if war ever came I would probably have to go to it myself, if I was not too old, and my four sons would certainly have to go. I ask those individuals who think of me as a firebrand to remember that during the seven and a half years I was President not a shot was fired at any soldier of a hostile nation by any American soldier or sailor; and there was not so much as a threat of war. Even when the State of Panama threw off the alien yoke of Colombia and when this nation, acting as was its manifest duty, by recognizing Panama as an independent State, stood for the right of the governed to govern themselves on the Isthmus, as well as for justice and humanity, there was not a shot fired by any of our people at any Colombian.

The blood shed at Vera Cruz, like the unpunished wrongs committed on our people in Mexico, had no parallel during my Administration. When I left the Presidency there was not a cloud on the horizon, and one of the reasons why there was not a cloud on the horizon was that the American battle fleet had just returned from its sixteen months' trip around the world, a trip such as no other battle fleet of any power had ever taken, which it had not been supposed could be taken, and which exercised a greater influence for Peace than all the Peace Congresses of the last fifteen years. With Lowell I most emphatically believe that peace is not a gift that tarries long in the hands of cowards; and the fool and the weakling are no improvement on the coward.

Nineteen centuries ago in the greatest of all books we were warned that whoso loses his life for righteousness shall save it, and that he who seeks to save it shall lose it. The ignoble and abject gospel of those who would teach us that it is preferable to endure disgrace and discredit than to run any risk to life or limb would defeat its own purpose; for that kind of submission to wrongdoing merely invites further wrongdoing, as has been shown a thousand times in history, and as is shown by the case of China in our own days.

Moreover, our people, however ill prepared, would never consent to such abject submission; and indeed as a matter of fact our publicists and public men and our newspapers, instead of being too humble and submissive, are only too apt to indulge in very offensive talk about foreign nations.

Of all the nations of the world we are the one that combines the greatest amount of wealth with the smallest ability to defend that wealth. Surely one does not have to read history very much or ponder over philosophy a great deal in order to realize the truth that the one certain way to invite disaster is to be opulent, offensive, and unarmed.

There is utter inconsistency between the ideal of making this nation the foremost commercial power in the world, and of disarmament in the face of an armed world. There is utter inconsistency between the ideal of making this nation a power for international righteousness and at the same time refusing to make us a power efficient in anything save empty treaties and emptier promises.

I do not believe in a large standing army. Most emphatically I do not believe in militarism. Most emphatically I do not believe in any policy of aggression by us. But I do believe that no man is really fit to be the free citizen of a free republic unless he is able to bear arms and at need to serve with efficiency in the efficient army of the republic. This is no new thing with me. For years I have believed that the young men of the country should know how to use a rifle and should have a short period of military training which, while not taking them for any length of time from civil pursuits, would make them quickly capable of helping defend the country in case of need.

When I was Governor of New York, acting in conjunction with the Administration at Washington under President McKinley, I secured the sending abroad of one of the best officers in the New York National Guard to study the Swiss system. As President I had to devote my attention chiefly to getting the navy built up. But surely the sight of what has happened abroad ought to awaken our people to the need of action, not only as regards our navy, but as regards our land forces also.

Australia has done well in this respect. But Switzerland has worked out a comprehensive scheme with practical intelligence. She has not only solved the question of having men ready to fight, but she has solved the question of having arms to give these men. At present England is in more difficulty about arms than about men, and some of her people when sent to the front were armed with hunting rifles.

Our own shortcomings are far greater. Indeed, they are so lamentable that it is hard to believe that our citizens as a whole know them. To equip half the number of men whom even the British now have in the field would tax our factories to the limit. In Switzerland, during the last two or three years of what corresponds to our high school work, the boy is thoroughly grounded in the rudiments of military training, discipline, and marksmanship. When he graduates he is put for some four months in the army to receive exactly the training he would get in time of war. After that he serves eight days a year and in addition often joins with his fellows in practicing at a mark. He keeps his rifle and accoutrements in his home and is responsible for their condition.

Efficiency is the watchword of Switzerland and not least in its army. At the outbreak of this terrible war, Switzerland was able to mobilize her forces in the corner of her territory between France and Germany as quickly as either of the great combatants could theirs; and no one trespassed upon her soil.

The Swiss training does not to any appreciable extent take the man away from his work. But it does make him markedly more efficient for his work. The training he gets and his short service with the colors render him appreciably better able to do whatever his job in life is, and, in addition, benefit his health and spirits. The service is a holiday, and a holiday of the best because of the most useful type.

There is no reason whatever why Americans should be unwilling or unable to do what Switzerland has done. We are a far wealthier country than Switzerland and could afford without the slightest strain the very trifling expense and the trifling consumption of time rendered necessary by such a system. It has really nothing in common with the universal service in the great conscript armies of the military powers. No man would be really taken out of industry. On the contrary, the average man would probably be actually benefited so far as doing his life work is concerned. The system would be thoroughly democratic in its workings. No man would be exempted from the work and all would have to perform the work alike. It would be entirely possible to arrange that there should be a certain latitude as to the exact year when the four or six months' service was given.

Officers of course would need a longer training than the men. This could readily be furnished either by allowing numbers of extra students to take partial or short-term courses at West Point or by specifying optional courses in the high schools, the graduates of these special courses being tested carefully in their field work and being required to give extra periods of service and being under the rigid supervision of the regular army. There could also be opportunities for promotion from the ranks for any one who chose to take the time and the trouble to fit himself.

Soldiers Must Have Actual Camp Practice.

THE four or six months' service with the colors would be for the most part in the open field. The drill hall and the parade ground do not teach more than 5 per cent. of what a soldier must actually know. Any man who has had any experience with ordinary organizations of the National Guard when taken into camp knows that at first only a very limited number of the men have any idea of taking care of themselves, and that the great majority suffer much from dyspepsia, just because they do not know how to take care of themselves.

The soldier needs to spend some months in actual campaign practice under canvas with competent instructors before he gets to know his duty. If, however, he has had previous training in the schools of such a type as that given in Switzerland and then has this actual practice he remains for some years efficient with no more training than eight or ten days a year.

The training will be given in large bodies. It is essential that men shall get accustomed to the policing and sanitary care of camps in which there are masses of soldiers. Moreover officers are wholly useless in war time unless they are accustomed to handle masses of men in co-operation with one another.

There are small sections of the population out of which it is possible to improvise soldiers in a short time. Men who are accustomed to ride and to shoot and to live in the open and who are hardy and enduring and by nature possess the figthing edge already know most of what it is necessary that a soldier should know and they can be taught the remainder in a very short time if under the right man. Morgan's Virginia Riflemen, Andrew Jackson's Tennesseans, Forrest's Southwestern Cavalry were all men of this kind; but even these men were of real use only after they were trained for many months or else if their leaders were born fighters and masters of men like Morgan, Jackson, and Forrest. Such leaders are rare. The ordinary dweller in civilization has to be taught to shoot, to walk, (or ride if he is in the cavalry,) to cook for himself, to make himself comfortable in the open and to take care of his feet and his health generally.

It may well be that the Swiss on an average can be made into good troops quicker than our own men; but most assuredly there would be number of Americans who would not be much behind the Swiss in such a matter. A body of volunteers of the kind I am describing would of course not be quite as good as a body of regulars of the same size, but they would be immeasurably better than the average soldiers produced by any system we now have or ever have had in connection with our militia.

Average American Not Interested in Army.

OUR regular army would be strengthened by them at the very beginning and would be set free in its entirety for immediate aggressive action; and in addition a levy in mass of the young men of the right age would mean that two or three million troops were put into the field who, although not quite as good as regulars, would at once be available in numbers sufficient to overwhelm any expeditionary force which it would be possible for any military power to send to our shores. The existence of such a force would render the immediate taking of cities like San Francisco, New York or Boston an impossibility and would free us from all danger from sudden raids and make it impossible even for an army corps to land with any prospect of success.

Our people are so entirely unused to things military that it is probably difficult for the average man to get any clear idea of our shortcomings. Unlike what is true in the military nations of the Old World, here the ordinary citizen takes no interest in the working of our War Department in time of peace. No President gains the slightest credit for himself by paying attention to it. Then, when a crisis comes and the War Department breaks down, instead of the people accepting what has happened with humility as due to their own fault during the previous two or three decades, there is a roar of wrath against the unfortunate man who happens to be in office at the time. There was such a roar of wrath against Secretary Alger in the Spanish war. Now, as a matter of fact, 90 per cent. of our shortcomings when the war broke out with Spain could not have been remedied by any action on the part of the Secretary of War. They were due to what had been done ever since the close of the civil war.

We were utterly unprepared. There had been no real manoeuvring of so much as a brigade and very rarely had any of our Generals commanded even a good-sized regiment in the field. The enlisted men and the junior officers of the regular army were good. Most of the officers above the rank of Captain were nearly worthless. There were striking exceptions of course, but, taking the average, I really believe that it would have been on the whole to the advantage of our army in 1898 if all the regular officers above the rank of Captain had been retired and if all the Captains who were unfit to be placed in the higher positions had also been retired. The Lieutenants were good.

The lack of administrative skill was even more marked than the lack of military skill. No one who saw the congestion of trains, supplies, animals, and men at Tampa will ever forget the impression of helpless confusion that it gave him. The volunteer forces included some organizations and multitudes of individuals offering first-class material. But as a whole the volunteer army would have been utterly helpless against any efficient regular force at the outset of the '98 war, probably almost as inefficient as were the two armies which fought one another at Bull Run in 1861. Even the efficiency of the regular army itself was such merely by comparison with the volunteers.

I do not believe that any army in the world offered finer material than was offered by the junior officers and enlisted men of the regular army which disembarked on Cuban soil in June, 1898, and by the end of the next two weeks probably the average individual infantry or cavalry organization therein was at least as good as the average organization of the same size in an Old World army. But taking the army as a whole and considering its management from the time it began to assemble at Tampa until the surrender of Santiago, I seriously doubt if it was as efficient as a really good European or Japanese army of half the size.

Since then we have made considerable progress. Our little army of occupation that went to Cuba at the time of the revolution in Cuba ten years ago was thoroughly well handled and did at least as well as any foreign force of the same size could have done. But it did not include 10,000 men, that is, it did not include as many men as the smallest military power in Europe would assemble any day for manoeuvres.

This is no new thing in our history. If only we were willing to learn from our defeats and failures instead of paying heed purely to our successes, we would realize that what I have above described is one of the common phases of our history. In the war of 1812, at the outset of the struggle, American forces were repeatedly beaten, as at Niagara and Bladensburg, by an enemy one-half or one-quarter the strength of the American army engaged.

Yet two years later these same American troops on the northern frontier, when trained and commanded by Brown, Scott, and Ripley, proved able to do what the finest troops of Napoleon were unable to do, that is, meet the British regulars on equal terms in the open; and the Tennessee backwoodsmen and Louisiana volunteers, when mastered and controlled by the iron will and warlike genius of Andrew Jackson, performed at New Orleans a really great feat. During the year 1812 the American soldiers on shore suffered shameful and discreditable defeats, and yet their own brothers at sea won equally striking victories, and this because the men on shore were utterly unprepared and because the men at sea had been thoroughly trained and drilled long in advance.

Exactly the same lessons are taught by the histories of other nations. When, during the Napoleonic wars, a small force of veteran French soldiers landed in Ireland they defeated without an effort five times their number of British troops at Castlebar. Yet the men whom they thus drove in wild flight were the own brothers of and often the very same men who a few years later under Wellington proved an over-match for the flower of the French forces. The nation that waits until the crisis is upon it before taking measures for its own safety pays heavy toll in the blood of its best and its bravest and in bitter shame and humiliation. Small is the comfort it can then take from the memory of the times when the noisy and feeble folk in its own ranks cried "Peace! Peace!" without taking one practical step to secure peace.

We can never follow out a worthy national policy, we can never be of benefit to others or to ourselves, unless we keep steadily in view as our ideal that of the just man armed, the man who is fearless, self-reliant, ready, because he has prepared himself for possible contingencies; the man who is scornful alike of those who would advise him to do wrong and of those who would advise him tamely to suffer wrong.

The great war now being waged in Europe, and the fact that no neutral nation has ventured to make even the smallest effort to alleviate or even to protest against the wrongs that have been done, show with lamentable clearness that all the Peace Congresses of the past fifteen years have accomplished precisely and exactly nothing so far as any great crisis is concerned.

Fundamentally this is because they have confined themselves to mere words, seemingly without realizing that mere words are utterly useless unless translated into deeds and that an ounce of promise which is accompanied by provision for a similar ounce of effective performance is worth at least a ton of promise as to which no effective method of performance is provided.

Furthermore, a very serious blunder has been to treat peace as the end instead of righteousness as the end. The greatest soldier patriots of history, Timoleon, John Hampden, Andreas Hofer, Koerner, the great patriot statesman-soldiers like Washington, the great patriot-statesmen like Lincoln, whose achievements for good depended upon the use of soldiers, have all achieved their immortal claim to the gratitude of mankind by what they did in just war. To condemn war in terms which would include the wars these men waged or took part in precisely as they include the most wicked and unjust wars of history is to serve the devil and not God.

We Should Resist Aggression, Not Be Aggressors.

AGAIN, these peace people have persistently and resolutely blinked facts. One of the Peace Congresses sat in New Jersey at the very time that the feeling in California about the Japanese question gravely threatened the good relations between ourselves and the great Empire of Japan. The only thing which at the moment could practically be done for the cause of peace was to secure some proper solution of the question at issue between ourselves and Japan. But this represented real effort, real thought. The Peace Congress paid not the slightest serious attention to the matter and instead devoted itself to listening to speeches which favored the abolition of the United States Navy and even in one case the prohibiting the use of tin soldiers in nurseries because of the militaristic effect on the minds of the little boys and girls who played with them!

I advocate that our preparedness take such shape as to fit us to resist aggression, not to encourage us in aggression. I advocate preparedness that will enable us to defend our own shores and defend the Panama Canal and Hawaii and Alaska and prevent the seizure of territory at the expense of any commonwealth of the Western Hemisphere by any military power of the Old World.

I advocate this being done in the most democratic manner possible. We Americans do not realise how fundamentally democratic our army really is. When I served in Cuba, it was under Gen. Sam Young and alongside of Gen. Adna Chaffee. Both had entered the American Army as enlisted men in the civil war. Later as President I made both of them in succession Lieutenant Generals and Commanders of the Army.

On the occasion when Gen. Chaffee was to appear at the White House for the first time as Lieutenant-General, Gen. Young sent him his own starred-shoulder-strap with a little note saying that it was from "Private Young, '61, to Private Chaffee, '61." Both of the fine old fellows represented the best type of citizen-soldier. Each was simply and sincerely devoted to Peace and Justice. Each was incapable of advocating our doing wrong to others. Neither could have understood willingness on the part of any American to see the United States submit tamely to insult or injury. Both typified the attitude that we Americans should take in our dealings with foreign countries.

WHAT GERMANY WANTS, EXPLAINED BY DR. VON MACH

Thwarted in Her Desire to Find Markets for Her Tremendous Output of Manufactures by Peaceful Means, He Says, She Has Been Compelled to Resort to Arms—Militarism Not by Any Means Exclusively German

ONE of the Prussian "Junker" class, that backbone of Prussian bureaucracy and militarism, has written a book explaining to Americans Germany's attitude in the present war. But he who expects in its talk of "world-power or downfall," à la Bernhardi, or pages of bitter hate for Great Britain, France, or Russia, will have a surprise.

The Prussian from whose pen this volume comes is singularly free from bitterness; unlike so many of those who have taken sides before him in the terrible world upheaval, he strives always to subordinate prejudice and patriotism to self-control. Whereas Bernhardi and Prof. Usher, author of "Pan-Germanism," declare world-conquest to be the desire of the German Nation, he disavows both of them as exponents of the German idea, insisting that his fellow-countrymen—including that target for untold denunciation, the Kaiser—are above all else a peace-loving people plunged into war against their will.

This latest champion of the Teutonic cause is Dr. Edmund von Mach, formerly of the Faculty of Harvard University, whence we have already heard Profs. Hugo Münsterberg and Kuno Francke on the same side of the case. He it was who wrote a reply in the Sunday TIMES to James M. Beck's article based on the "White Papers" of England and Germany, printed in THE TIMES the previous Sunday. Educated at the Schulpforte, most exclusive of North German schools, accessible practically to nobles alone, brother of the Governor of the North German Province of Pomerania, imbued with the ideas and ideals of the "Junker" caste, it seems strange indeed to hear Prof. von Mach brush aside von Bernhardi and all his school as unrepresentative of the true Germany, and declare that Great Britain and Russia, not Germany, are in the grip of militarism.

Pro-German he is to the core, as firmly convinced as his more violent brothers of the justice of the German cause. But the very moderation which differentiates his writing from theirs should commend him to those desirous of understanding how intelligent Germans look upon their part in the awful cataclysm that has burst over the world.

Dr. von Mach's book is called "What Germany Wants," (Little, Brown & Co., Boston, $1.) Like other pro-German writers he insists on two things—that Germany is not understood abroad and that her acts have been judged altogether too hastily.

The average American, he says, drinking in the words of the fire-eating Bernhardi and of Usher, exposer of the German lust for world conquest, has formed an entirely erroneous conception of Germany's desires. That there are people in the Fatherland who share the ideas of Bernhardi and who are extreme pan-Germanists Prof. von Mach does not deny for a minute. But he insists that they should no more be taken as representative of the aims of a nation than should Homer Lea, the "English Bernhardi," as von Mach dubs him, author of "The Day of the Anglo-Saxon," who declared that "it is the first duty of the British nation to arrest or destroy German power." The book of the fire-eating German General failed to make much of a stir in Germany, says von Mach, for the simple reason that it was looked upon merely as one of a numerous class of books dealing with wars of the future, many of which were produced by Frenchmen, and foreshadowed the sweeping triumph of France over Germany. One of the latter, he takes care to point out, outlined not only the invasion of Belgium by French troops, but its definite occupation by them. "It will on reflection hardly be doubted," continues the German writer, "that Bernhardi neither spoke for the Germans as such, nor that his book had any influence on the people as a whole." And he goes on:

Since Germany started on her industrial development she has never desired war. Her aggressiveness has been solely commercial, and commercial aggressiveness and military aggressiveness are mutually destructive.

Germany wants to keep the confines of her home land inviolate, but it is not desirous of joining to them new lands of unwilling people.

She wants to develop her colonies and invest her money in the building of extra-territorial railways which will ultimately bring her into relation with new markets.

She wants to develop her home commerce and industry and increase the usefulness of her agriculture that she may give employment to a population growing at the rate of about a million a year. There has been no balance of emigration from Germany for many years.

"Germany Wants Peace."

Over and above these desires she has the very natural and proper ambition to be worthy of her great past and to make her own contributions to the civilization of the world. She wants social justice and she wishes to remove from her laboring classes the ills of poverty.

Germany wants peace, for in peace only can she do what she has set out to do. She wants an honorable and stable peace, and in so far as the defects of her character have been contributory causes of misunderstandings she wishes to eradicate these defects. She desires the good-will of the world.

Why, then, one asks, Germany's huge army and growing navy? Because, declares Dr. von Mach, her peace-loving proclivities have been thwarted. She has felt that there are forces working against her peaceful commercial development. Urged on by the necessity of feeding 1,000,000 more mouths a year, she has turned her eyes everywhere in search of new markets for her products, and, in so doing, has come into dangerous competition with "the country that loves to call herself the Mistress of the Sea." Mutual distrust and jealousy have resulted. Dr. von Mach writes:

In Germany the feeling grew that England wished to destroy the world market of her rival, and history seemed to bear this out, for had England not destroyed or attached to herself in turn the great world commerce of Spain, Portugal, France, Holland, and the United States? The merchant marines of all these nations had fallen a prey to England, because in the hour of need they had not been defended by a sufficiently large navy. It was, therefore, the duty of Germany to build a navy, not for the sake of aggression, but to defend her world commerce if England should find an opportune moment of attack. This was Germany's view of the case.

England, however, feared lest the German Navy grow too strong to be merely defensive. She knew that Germany needed new markets and opportunities every year, and suspected that some day her rival, unable to create new markets, would try to rob her by force of her own.

Hostility to England.

In a perfectly natural way, therefore, feelings of mistrust began to separate the English from the Germans, who, by all the laws of nature, should stand side by side in this world in a joint effort to advance the sum total of civilization.

That the great clash had to come in 1914 is the more regrettable since friends of peace had detected the approach of a better understanding between the Germans and the English. It is now well known that the German Chancellor had launched on a distinctly friendly English policy some years ago.

While on the same subject, Dr. von Mach quotes the following significant words from a book by the German writer, Paul Rohrbach, written in 1912:

We do not take it at all amiss that England's pride and consciousness of mastery revolts at the imputation that she should hereafter recognize the interests of another nation as equal to her own, not only in Europe, but also in the transoceanic world. Nobody in the world has the right to blame a great and sovereign nation if it prefers, under these conditions, to fight rather than to submit. It is true, as Mr. Churchill said, that all possessions of the English race are endangered as soon as her power on the seas is at stake.

But we can reply with exactly the same right: Not only our goods and wealth, but also our national existence and the future of our national idea in the world are at stake, when our defenses by land and by sea are insufficient to make our opponents look on an attack upon us as too great a risk. It does not occur to us to deny the superiority of the English fleet, and if the English people wish very much to use the word supremacy rather than superiority they are welcome to do so.

But when they interpret their "supremacy" to mean that our interests shall yield to theirs everywhere in the world they will compel us to fight with them for our future; that is to say, our national existence. If they wish to prescribe to us how far we may go in the world to spread our ideas we should be fools and cowards if we were to acknowledge this foreign command as binding without recourse to arms.

As to German militarism, of which so much is heard nowadays, Dr. von Mach is of the opinion that Great Britain, France, and other nations are in the position of people living in glass houses yet addicted to throwing stones. He calls attention to the fact that Gen. von Bernhardi says that the Germans had become so successful in peace that they had forgotten their military abilities, thus becoming too peaceful for their own safety, and deplores that these words have been far too seldom included in the excerpts made of late from the writings of that much-quoted General. In denying the charge that Germany is an armed camp, bankrupted by its huge outlay for war armament, Dr. von Mach writes:

In this connection it is interesting to compare the actual figures and to see how much the several big nations of the world have been in the habit of paying for their "national defenses." The complete figures of all the countries for the past two years are not yet available. They are larger in every instance than the latest figures given below. But since the actual increase in the German figures is less than the increase in the French and British, and especially the Russian figures, the argument of the present investigation will not be affected. To guard against any inaccuracy the German figures are given as they were published in million marks, and to simplify the comparison the other figures are reduced to million marks. The approximate value of a mark is almost 24 cents, or for rough calculation one-fourth of a dollar.

1. Germany expended:

	1902, Marks.	1911, Marks.
For the army	670,000,000	810,000,000
For the navy	205,000,000	450,000,000
Together	875,000,000	1,260,000,000

Figured per capita of the population this was in 1902 15 marks and in 1911 19 1-5 marks.

2. The United Kingdom expended:

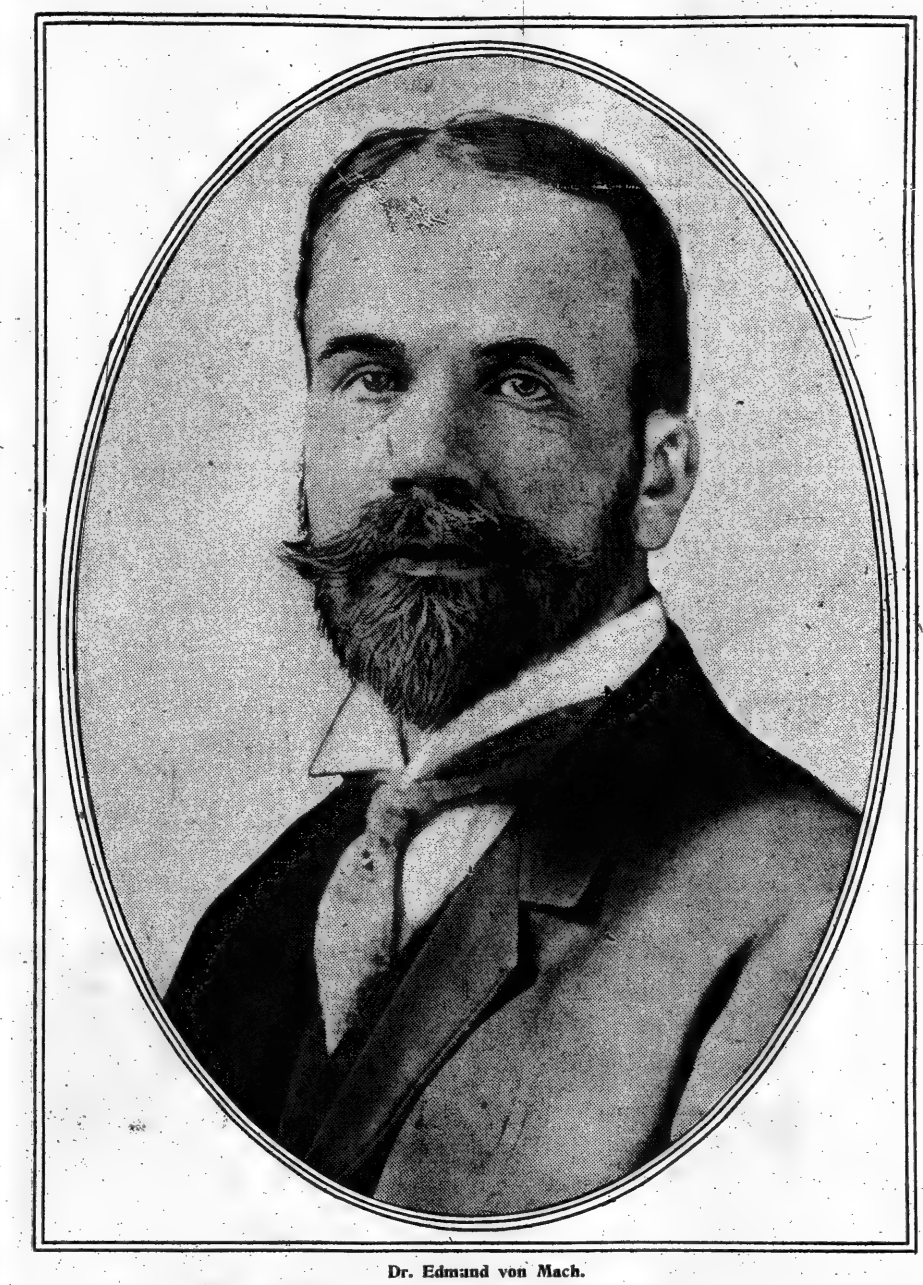
	1902, Marks.	1911, Marks.
For the army	585,000,000	547,000,000
For the navy	633,000,000	906,000,000
Together	1,218,000,000	1,453,000,000

Figured per capita of the population this was in 1902 29 marks and in 1911 32 marks, or about 60 per cent. more than Germany.

3. France expended:

	1902, Marks.	1911, Marks.
For the army	584,000,000	718,000,000
For the navy	243,000,000	333,000,000
Together	827,000,000	1,051,000,000

Figured per capita of the population this was in 1902 21 marks and in 1911 26½ marks, or about 26 per cent. more than Germany.



Dr. Edmund von Mach.

4. The United States expended:

	1902, Marks.	1911, Marks.
For the army	511,000,000	559,000,000
For the navy	349,000,000	535,000,000
Together	860,000,000	1,066,000,000

Figured per capita of the population this was in 1911 almost 12 marks, or only 62½ per cent., of the German expenditures:

5. Russia expended:

	1902, Marks.	1911, Marks.
For the army	741,000,000	1,048,000,000
For the navy	217,000,000	238,000,000
Together	958,000,000	1,286,000,000

Figured per capita of the population this was, in 1902, about 7 marks and in 1911 8½ marks.

Of these five nations, therefore, the United Kingdom spent most on her army and navy. Russia came next; then followed in this order: Germany, the United States, and France. Reckoned, however, per capita of the population, the United Kingdom and France are far in advance of Germany, while the United States and Russia are at the bottom of the list.

But to read the true value of these statistics one should also investigate the increase of wealth per capita of the population, and then it will be seen that the 19 1-5 marks per capita paid in Germany in 1911 weighed less heavily on the people than the 15 marks in 1902, for their average wealth had grown enormously. If, on the other hand, the average wealth of Russia is considered, the 8½ marks per capita she paid in 1911 is much greater than the 19 1-5 marks paid by Germany.

It appears, therefore, that also from the point of actual expenditure Germany cannot be called the exclusive home of militarism. This would be even clearer if the most recent figures were available, for France increased within the last years the length of service of her soldiers from two to three years and enlisted in her army practically every young man who was not too obviously incapacitated.

This, it has been claimed, was on her part a move to which the size of the German Army had compelled her. But no flight of the imagination of even the most anti-German observer has been able to detect on the part of Germany any intention of attacking France. If France had not wished to assist Russia, or rather to fight Germany when the latter was partly engaged by Russia, there need not have been a French-German war. Germany surely did not want anything of France, while France had set her heart on Alsace-Lorraine.

The tremendous expenditures for the British Army will probably be a distinct surprise to the Americans, many of whom have been thinking only of the British Navy. Whether they agree with Germany or not they will appreciate the humor of the situation as it appears to the Germans, who are told that the British are fighting to put down militarism, when they are actually paying 60 per cent. per capita more for their armaments than Germany.

The humor of the situation even grows when the British attitude is taken into consideration. In a friendly discussion with an American of English descent the author was told that the success of the Allies would result in universal disarmament by the establishment of an international police. When he inquired how, in view of the general disarmament, the decrees of this court would be enforced, he was told: "Oh, well, the British Navy will naturally form an important part of this police."

From these various points of view, therefore, Germany pleads "Not guilty!" to the charge of being the home of militarism. But if we strip militarism of its unpleasant connotations of absolutism and vicious aggressiveness, and think of it, in its more literal meaning, as having to do with the militia, the citizen-army of a State, then Germany is willing to acknowledge that she has endeavored to build up the best citizen-army for defense her conditions permitted. Of this she is not ashamed, nor does she fear that America, the home of men ready to die for freedom, will blame her when everything is understood.

In endeavoring to explain her attitude in violating Belgium's neutrality, the German scholar, writing a number of weeks ago, took the same line adopted by Mr. Beck in his article.

Defends German Action.

Mr. Beck, it will be remembered, sifted the evidence, as shown in the "White Papers" of England and Germany and the "Orange Paper" of Russia, and constructed his article in the form of a lawyer's argument in a case before a law court. The case was that of "The Double Alliance Against the Triple Entente"; the court, "The Supreme Court of Civilization." Dr. von Mach got very much the same idea, for, in writing on the question of the invasion of Belgium, he says:

On Aug. 4 the German Chancellor announced to the Reichstag that by infringing the neutrality [of Belgium and Luxemburg] Germany had broken the law of nations, but that Germany was fighting for her existence against several foes, and in self-defense had been forced to take this step. This open confession, unembellished by any excuse, is truly German.

Sometimes a prisoner pleads guilty because he is too proud to take advantage of the safeguards offered by the law, and then the humane Judge refuses to accept his plea and assigns to the accused a lawyer. Suppose that in this case the court of public opinion should refuse to accept Germany's plea of guilty and should insist upon a defense. It could be based on several, noticeably three, lines of argument.

First, Belgium had shown such hostility toward Germany and such warm friendship toward France in recent years that Germany's fear that Belgium would not remain neutral was reasonable. An advance by France through Belgium would have been fatal to Germany, for the geographical aspect of the country is such that she could not have defended herself here with only half her army, the other half being engaged on her Eastern frontier. An initial success by the French in that part of Germany would have threatened her only big ports, Bremen and Hamburg, and her naval base at Kiel. Their destruction would have been fatal.

The artillery at Liége was under the instruction of French officers, and the fact that these officers were not requested to leave, but remained in the country after mobilization was ordered in Germany and France adds to the justification of Germany's belief.

The law knows no favorites. If Germany was right in believing that Belgium would not preserve her neutrality, the law which forbade her from entering Belgium would have worked an injustice. Belgium was no longer entitled to immunity from invasion. Germany is innocent; as witnesses, call the files of the Belgian press of the past two years, and the French officers who remained at Liége.

The second argument would run as follows: Belgian neutrality rests on the Treaty of 1839, which was signed by Great Britain, France, Russia, Prussia, and Austria, in addition to Belgium and Holland. This treaty was in the nature of a contract, and as such enjoys all the validity the law gives it.

The law, however, does not recognize the validity of a contract signed under duress. Prussia and Austria were forced to sign the treaty. As witnesses, call any creditable history describing the events of 1839.

As further witnesses call the treaties made by Great Britain and Prussia, and Great Britain and France on Aug. 9 and 11, 1870, guaranteeing the neutrality of Belgium during the Franco-Prussian War. If Great Britain had considered the neutrality agreement of 1839 valid, why should she have made another agreement in 1870? Or, if she considered the earlier treaty valid, but doubted the reliability of the signatories, how could the signatures of these powers be said to be more trustworthy because they were signed to a new treaty? And why did the treaties of 1870 contain the clause that they were to terminate with the end of the war, after which the neutrality of Belgium was to rest on whatever validity there was in the treaty of 1839?

Finally, call as witness the speeches of Mr. Gladstone, who said in 1870, referring to the neutrality treaty of Belgium, "I am not able to subscribe to the doctrine of those who have held in this House what plainly amounts to an assertion that the simple fact of the existence of a guarantee is binding on every party to it, irrespective altogether of the particular position in which it may find, itself at the time when the occasion for acting on the guarantee arises."

For all these reasons the contract of 1839 is invalid, and Germany is not guilty.

The third line of argument would claim that Germany was fighting for her very existence. It is immaterial whether her own lack of precaution had brought her to the pass where she had to defend herself from three or more foes. Her life was in danger. As witnesses call the speeches of King George in proroguing Parliament, of Lloyd George, and of the openly expressed intentions of France and Russia. The law recognizes self-defense as a valid excuse. Germany, therefore, is not guilty.

Suppose, now, that the judge of public opinion, after listening to these arguments, turned to Germany and she should repeat, as she probably would, that she had felt obliged to act as she did, and would leave it to him to decide whether she was guilty or not, would not the judge before passing sentence call the witnesses demanded by counsel, and if some could not be brought into court for some time, would he not adjourn the case to a later day? And in the meanwhile, is it not the rule in all civilized countries that the accused is considered innocent until he has been proved guilty? Condemnation on ex parte evidence is abhorrent to all justice-loving countries, and to none perhaps more than to America.

Similar arguments may be made in defense of many further accusations brought against Germany.

Dr. von Mach devotes considerable space to the bewildering complications of the Slavic problem in its relation both to Germany and her ally, Austria-Hungary. He is of the opinion that the world at large has attached too little importance to the murder of the Archduke Francis Ferdinand last June, a crime committed, according to him, "by Servian assassins, and with weapons supplied from the Servian arsenal by Servian officers." Suppose, he says, that the most prominent American were murdered by Mexican assassins with weapons supplied by the Mexican Government. Suppose, further, that the conspirators escaped into Mexican territory, helped by Mexican officials; that the Mexican press burst into joyful paeans extolling the crime; that the Mexican Government took no measures to bring the assassins to justice. Would not Americans then realize how Austrians feel about the Serajevo murder?

Dealing with this same topic, he makes the following singularly frank remark:

Almost four weeks after the murder Austria sent her ultimatum to Servia. It was very strongly worded, and undoubtedly less diplomatic than Great Britain would have written it had she been in Austria's position. The British State papers are always well written, for her world-wide interests have taught her that official documents are strong factors in the shaping of public opinion. They are therefore written not only for the benefit of the recipient, but also for the world at large.

If Germany and Austria would follow this example they would meet less opposition in foreign countries. It is not so much what they do as the way they do it that offends people.

Praise for the Kaiser.

Undeterred by the widespread hostility now existing against the German Emperor, Dr. von Mach valiantly takes upon himself to defend his sovereign. To him the Kaiser is a prince of peace; to class him as a War Lord is to misunderstand him completely. He denies emphatically that the German ruler is under the influence of a military clique. "The fact is that the communal and individual life of Germany," he goes on, "is so thoroughly democratic and that the men at the heads of the various departments are drawn from so wide a range of social antecedents that it is no longer possible to speak of a 'clique' as in control of the Government."

In conclusion Dr. von Mach makes this interesting comparison between German and English methods of procedure:

German statesmen have often called England a hypocrite, and themselves have been called unscrupulous believers in the pernicious doctrine that might makes right. Both estimates are unjust. An individual person may prefer to suffer rather than to do or seem to do a unjust act, but the men charged with the welfare of a nation must make that welfare the main consideration of their actions. While they will shrink from taking an actually unjust step, they may not feel justified in refraining from doing what they think is right and necessary, merely because it may appear to be wrong.

To this extent Germans and Britons are alike. In their way of explaining their actions, however, their fundamental differences of character are seen.

The Briton feels obliged to advance some kind of a moral reason for what he does, and thereby shows that he believes morality should rule the actions of nations as well as those of individuals. Sometimes the reason he advances seems far-fetched to those who are familiar with all the facts, but to those at a distance morality seems to have won another victory.

The German shrinks from advancing a reason which is not, in reality, the one that is controlling his action. With a regard for morality as high as that of the Briton, he refuses to make morality an excuse, and when the welfare of the nation and dire necessity have forced him to do as he did, he baldly states this fact, although his case would be stronger in the court of public opinion if he had justified himself.

CAN WOMEN RUN A HOME? NO!

Man Has Rescued Housekeeping from Chaos, Solemnly Declares the Philosopher-at-Large.

ALL this talk from the female side of the house, about women being needed to do our municipal, State, and national housekeeping, is just so much empty cackling," remarked the philosopher-at-large.

"Let the ladies attempt the colossal job of running the Government for us when they haven't as yet qualified in the 2 by 4 job of running our individual homes? Sounds like a joke!

"Examine her with a cold, bargain-counter eye, an eye unclouded by sentiment, and you'll admit that as a business proposition woman is a failure. Why, the most casual student of home-life knows that she has failed in what for countless generations has been her own peculiar sphere; that in no division of the field of labor is the work so disorganized, so inefficient as it is in the kitchen patch.

"And note this," (the philosopher-at-large wagged an impressive forefinger)—"note this carefully: wherever you find any order in the chaos, any efficiency, any economy of time or labor brought about by organization, it is man who is responsible for it.

"Yes, Sir, Man has got to work straightening out the kinks of home life. Just see what he has accomplished already.

"The loom and the spinning wheel used to stand in grandmother's kitchen. Can't you see grandfather waiting until far into the Winter for his homespun suit, just as now I often have to wait until far into the night for my dinner? And when the cloth was at last woven, can't you picture grandfather, weary from his day's toil, waiting until the dishes were washed, the pots and pans cleaned, and the children put to bed, to try on his new suit—back in those good old days? Hard on grandfather; hard, too, on grandmother.

"Man came to the rescue. 'Give me those looms and spinning wheels,' said he, and he put them into factories. And now, by spending ten or fifteen minutes and as many dollars on a Saturday night you and I have our ready-to-wear suits.

"And grandmother's knitting needles were taken out of her unreluctant hands, and in his factories man wove his own underclothes and socks, mittens and mufflers. Then man began to take mother's dress patterns and dummies from her, and over his store counters gave her gowns and shirtwaists and lingerie and neckwear and bonnets.

"The old oaken bucket is very beautiful in song, but did grandmother love it when she plowed through the snow or waded in mud to fetch every drop of water for the household? Man built reservoirs and laid pipes, and now grandmother cheerfully hums 'How dear to my heart are the scenes of my childhood' as she turns on the faucet and fills the bathtub.

"Grandmother used to save the tallow and make candles, or, at a little later day, fill the lamps, clean the chimneys and trim the wicks. Now she turns on the gas and strikes a match; or, if truly up to date, she eliminates the match and merely switches on the electric light. And where, let me ask you, are the coal scuttle and the ash barrel? Man has kicked them out of the home and handed woman the gas range and the electric heater.

"And what of the wash tub, the clothes wringer and the flatiron? Man traveled all the way from China to take these out of woman's hands; and now innumerable Ching Lees aided by countless steam laundries are doing her washing and ironing.

"But man did not pause here in his reformation. He pushed his way over the kitchen threshold and said: 'Here, too, I will help you.' Then he went back to his factories and bottled her pickles, preserved her fruits, canned her vegetables, jarred her jams, soused her mackerel, stewed her plum pudding, prepared her breakfast foods, and baked her bread, cakes, and pies.

"And that day of fume and fret, of disruption and chaos—the quarterly housecleaning day. Man has taken that, too, in hand. The household gods now repose in unruffled peace while the man from the housecleaning company quietly inhales the dirt into his vacuum duster and carts it off to the rubbish heap.

"There is one thorny problem, however, that the household still has in its midst—the servant girl problem. It is a world-old problem that seems to grow thornier with age. For a long time the loudest wails of the housekeeper were: 'Servants are wasteful'; 'Servants are incompetent'; 'Servants are overmuch given to grumbling.' A few years back the housewife's wail became a howl: 'We can't get servants at all!'

"What caused this? Simply that the long-continued bellowings of the suffragettes had seeped down through the parlor into the kitchen. 'Have women no rights?' shrieked the lady orator. And the awakened Bridgets paused over the nation's cook stoves and washtubs to chorus back an enthusiastic 'Sure!' And so, responding to the spirit of the times which says 'In organization there is strength,' they got together and formed unions and their nebulous grumblings have become solidified into a schedule of rights.

"Say they: 'No more of those old catch-as-catch-can relationships between the lady in the parlor and the one in the kitchen. Everything now must be upon a plain, exact business basis. A specified number of hours shall constitute a week's work. Overtime shall be paid for all work in excess of those hours, double rate for overtime at night, on Sundays and holidays. All laundry work done at home must be paid for at regular laundry rates. Household assistants required to attend babies or otherwise care for children, except assistants regularly and exclusively employed for the purpose, to be allowed an additional charge per hour. Household assistants required to tend the furnace shall be paid a weekly bonus. A similar bonus to be paid for each and every guest who stays for more than one meal.'

"There's the situation, the ominous situation that confronts us in our homes today—a situation more heavily charged with disruptive potentialities than an anarchist's bomb.'

"And what are the women doing about it?

"Why, they are just letting the situation sputter closer and closer to a blow-up, while they are busy filling the air with shrieks that they ought to have the vote so that their housekeeping abilities can have a nation-wide scope."

The philosopher-at-large banged his fist upon the table as with warning detonation:

"Believe me, Sir, if the blow-up is to be avoided, if our homes are to be saved from extinction, man must take this household problem also in hand, and he's got to be mighty quick about it."

HITHERTO UNPUBLISHED PAGES IN WAR'S PRELUDE

Railway Cartography Reveals Germany's Elaborate Preparations to Violate Belgium's Neutrality—Documents Show Austria's Premeditation in an Attempt to Annihilate Servia with the Help of Bulgaria.

Map showing German railroad operations during the past five years near the border of Belgium.

By Walter Littlefield.

TWO things stand out prominently in the discussions of the responsibility for the European war: the violation of Belgium's neutrality and the Austro-Hungarian ultimatum to Servia. Anything that throws light on them is of especial importance at this time.

There have lately come to hand certain documents which make it possible to review the contention of expediency advanced by both Germany and Austria-Hungary. The first embraces a project for railway expansion engineered and carried out by Germany during the last five years on the Belgian frontier which can hardly be accounted for by the industrial development of the territory covered. The second is an order issued by the Bulgarian General Staff which seems to show that Bulgaria and not Servia or Greece began the second Balkan war. The third, apparently, accounts for this order by revealing that a treaty had recently been entered into between Austria-Hungary and Bulgaria by which the latter was expected to annihilate Servia.

There can be no doubt that Germany realized just what she was doing when she marched her troops into Belgium. The question is, had she any preconceived idea of such a march?

In the southwest corner of Prussia is a quadrilateral piece of territory, the western and eastern sides of which are formed respectively by the Belgian and Luxemburg frontiers and the River Rhine. This territory includes about 3,600 square miles and supports a population, including the great centres of Cologne, Coblenz, Aix-la-Chapelle, and Treves, of nearly 1,000,000 souls. In other words, it is an area about half as large as New Jersey, if we omit that State's water surface, and just about as thickly populated.

Immense Increase in Railways.

Five years ago this little corner of Prussia had about 15.10 miles of railway to every 100 square miles of territory and New Jersey 30.23. In five years the Prussian territory has increased her railway mileage to 28.30 and New Jersey to only a little less than 30.25.

Five years ago, in the Prussian territory, the only double lines existing were those from Cologne to Treves, from Coblenz to Treves, and the two double lines, one on each side of the Rhine, from Cologne to Coblenz, thus forming the three sides of a triangle. There was also the double track running from Cologne to Aix-la-Chapelle. These double lines were fed as commerce required by only two sets of single-track lines, all amounting to a little less than 550 miles of traction—a very fair service considering the products of the country covered.

In five years, without any apparent industrial or commercial demand for it, this traction has been increased to nearly twice its length, or to about 1,020 miles. Villages like Dumpelfeld, Ahrdorf, Hillesheim, Pronsfeld, and the health resort of Gerolstein of comic opera fame, all of less than 1,300 inhabitants, have been linked up by double-track lines with towns like Remagen, St. Vith, and Andernach, whose populations only range from 1,500 to 9,000.

Exactly what has been done? In the first place the Stolberg-St. Vith line has been relaid and doubled, and very extensive detraining stations constructed at various points along it, especially at Weiwertz and St. Vith. Then the Remagen-Adenau line has been doubled as far as Dumpelfeld, whence a double line has been continued to Hillesheim, with double branches outward from Hillesheim to Pelm and Junkerath, both on the Cologne-Treves Railway.

Then from Ahrdorf, between Dumpelfeld and Hillesheim, a single line has been built to connect with the Cologne-Treves line at Blankenheim, and a most important double-track laid across the barren country from Junkerath to Weiwertz on the Stolberg-St. Vith line.

Ready for Heaviest Traffic.

It will thus be seen that five lines converge on Pelm: the double line from Cologne, the new double line from Remagen via Hillesheim, and the single line from Andernach. Pelm is two and three-quarters miles from Gerolstein, and yet over this short distance between the two villages there are laid down six parallel lines of rail, besides numerous additional sidings. Moreover, the double line from Hillesheim to Junkerath crosses over the main Cologne-Treves line by a bridge, and runs parallel to it for some distance before turning off to the left to reach Weiwertz.

In fact the knot of lines around Junkerath, Pelm, and Gerolstein is a marvel of construction for heavy, rapid transit, for no congestion would arise in case of a sudden flood of traffic going in various directions, and to secure still more freedom the line from Gerolstein to Pronsfeld has been doubled.

Few of these lines, it is to be noted, cross the frontier. Three of them as late as last May led to blind terminals within less than a day's march from it—the double line from Cologne via Stolberg to Weiwertz, the double line from Cologne via Junkerath and Weiwertz to St. Vith, and the double line from Remagen via Hillesheim and Pelm to Pronsfeld.

The cost of the whole system, with its numerous bridges and multiple sidings, must have been enormous. The German average of $108,500 to the mile would hardly cover it.

Here is what a traveler saw when he visited this corner of Prussia last May:

> The — is as much struck by the significance of the ordinary traffic along these lines as he is by the huge embankments and cuttings on which nothing has yet had time to grow, and by the inordinate extent and number of the sidings to be seen everywhere. Baby trains, consisting of a locomotive and four short cars, dodder along two or three times a day, and if a freight train happens to be encountered, it will be found to be loaded with railway plant.
> Another point that is noticeable is that provision exists everywhere at these new junctions and extensions for avoiding an up-line crossing a down-line on the level; the up line is carried over the down line by a bridge, involving long embankments on both sides and great expense, but enormously simplifying traffic problems when it comes to a question of full troop trains pushing through at the rate of one every quarter of an hour, and the empty cars returning eastward at the same rate.
> The detraining stations are of sufficient length to accommodate the longest troop train (ten cars) easily, and they generally have at least four sidings, apart from the through up-and-down lines. Moreover, at almost every station there are two lines of siding long enough for troop trains, so that they can be used to some extent as detraining stations, and so that a couple of troop trains can be held up at any time while traffic continues uninterrupted.

It is hard to believe that this system was constructed for any other purpose than to prepare for the exigency which might some day force Germany to ignore the Treaty of 1839 and invade Belgium. At least it presumably accounts for the vast armies which invested Liége and Namur in the early days of last August.

Austro-Russian Clash in Balkans.

In order to show what bearing a certain Bulgarian General Staff order might have had on the destiny of Servia sixteen months ago, and how Austria-Hungary was apparently so interested in having that order carried out that she actually made a treaty with Bulgaria for its consummation, it is necessary to set before the reader a brief description of the forces which were, and are still, contending for mastery in the Balkans, together with certain events which led to the war between the Balkan allies after they had vanquished the Turk, for the published accounts of that period have not been thoroughly informing.

It is no more than a fair deduction to make from Balkan history that both Russia and Austria-Hungary have long aspired to dominate the peninsula—the former because through the Slavonic peoples who dwell there she hopes to secure the political, or at least the commercial, control of a southern port that shall be free from ice the year round; the latter because she wishes to extend her coast line on the Adriatic, possibly secure a port on the Aegean Sea, but, more than anything else, to keep the Slavs of the Balkan States so weak that, on the one hand, they shall not interfere with her own Slavonic population, and, on the other, that their weakness and mutual jealousies should tend to keep the Turk as a barrier between Russia and the Mediterranean.

It is thus obvious that the first Balkan war in which Bulgaria, Servia, Montenegro, and Greece were leagued against Turkey and reduced the latter's territory in Europe from 69,350 square miles to 10,882 square miles was really a victory for Russia's policy and a defeat for the policy of Austria-Hungary. But the Treaty of London, May 30, 1913, which ended the war, did not say how the spoils were to be divided. Servia had hoped to obtain a strip of coast on the Adriatic south of Montenegro, or at least a port there, but it had so happened, at the ambassadorial conference which had preceded the Treaty of London, that Austria-Hungary, backed up by Germany, France, and England, but passively opposed by Italy, and actively by Russia, had insisted that an independent State be created south of Montenegro, thus shutting off Servia from the sea. Austria-Hungary had her way, and on Dec. 20, 1912, the conference had agreed to the principle of autonomy for the land coveted by Servia. Thus the new State of Albania came into being.

Almost immediately after the signing of the Treaty of London the Balkan League broke up, and, as commonly reported, its members fell to fighting among themselves over a division of the ceded Turkish territory, until this second Balkan war was brought to a close by Rumania's invasion of Bulgaria and the Treaty of Bucharest, Aug. 10, 1913, when a part of Bulgarian territory was ceded to Rumania as compensation for her neutrality during the war of the league against Turkey, and the latter's territory surrendered by the Treaty of London, with the exception of Adrianople, which had been reconquered, was equitably divided up among the former allies.

Now the ambassadorial conferences at London had strongly recommended that the Balkan States to whom the Turkish territory had been ceded should demobilize their armies before they proceeded to fix boundary lines. Doubtless the Chancelleries of the powers foresaw a conflict, for Bulgaria had already announced her major claim, and this claim was disputed by both Servia and Greece. Moreover, at the Peace Congress the Servian Premier, M. Pashitch, had made to the Austro-Hungarian Foreign Minister, Count Berchtold, (he who signed the drastic ultimatum to Servia on July 23 last,) overtures for a direct settlement.

Austria Rebuffs Servia.

It is a matter of record that M. Pashitch offered Austria-Hungary economic and financial concessions of a far-reaching character, and begged Count Berchtold to use his influence to secure satisfaction for "the legitimate aspirations of Servia to a commercial port." He offered binding guarantees that this port would be purely commercial, and urged that friendship between the two countries would be sealed by such proof of Austro-Hungarian good-will. These overtures were summarily rejected.

Failing here, Servia next turned to Bulgaria. She dispatched to Sofia a note of about 1,500 words, complaining of her treatment, and suggesting four grounds for adjustment. The note is dated June 20, 1913, and reads in part:

> In the new state of affairs Bulgaria obtains all its non-contested territory, whereas Servia loses from its non-contested territory that part which is west of the Char with the Adriatic coast. Further, whereas the Great Powers allow Bulgaria on the east to keep Thrace, with Adrianople (later kept by Turkey) in addition to its non-contested territory, on the west they deprive Servia of the most important part of her non-contested territory and present it to Albania.
> The new basis which should be used in considering the liquidation of the condominion should be established by a joint agreement between all others. This basis should assure to Servia a surplus in addition to that part of the contested territory which belongs to her according to the treaty [of the Balkan League]:
> 1. A section of territory as compensation for all the obligations which Bulgaria did not fulfill, but should have fulfilled according to the treaty.
> 2. A section of territory as compensation for all the sacrifices suffered by Servia on behalf of Bulgaria, which she was not bound to do according to the treaty.
> 3. A section of territory as compensation for the territory obtained by Bulgaria in the west.
> 4. A section of territory as compensation for the non-contested territory in the east and the Adriatic coast, which Servia loses.

The note ends with the words:

> As Servia is deprived of an essential condition of her economic independence, (i. e., an outlet to the sea,) she considers that she is within her rights in asking that, with an equitable division, she shall be assured in the south a situation satisfying her existence and her economic development. This demand is in conformity with the principles of international law, for not only would it be unjust if Servia were to suffer all the injury caused by external circumstances, but, further, she cannot permit her geographical situation to become still more precarious after the war than it was before.

These reasons lead to the belief that Bulgaria will accept the proposed agreement, which is to serve as a basis not only for the settlement of the relations between the two countries, but also for the facilitation of the definite liquidation of the condominion of the Allies.

Bulgaria rejected the foregoing proposals. A second and then a third note followed. In the last Servia suggested that the matter be referred to The Hague Tribunal for adjustment. King Peter of Servia also asked the Czar of Russia to arbitrate. In his letter, dated June 23, 1913, making this request the King wrote:

> The Servian people have during the past century made the greatest sacrifices for the liberty of Balkan Christians, and we express the hope that the mighty protector of the Slavonic nations will allow each nation the possibilities of free development, and thus forever cement the unity of the Slavonic nations with the mighty northern empire.

In a final effort to preserve its country from the affliction of another war the Servian Government proposed to the Bulgarian Government to reduce their respective armies to one-fourth their forces.

The Second Balkan War.

Then suddenly, on June 30, 1913, without any warning war broke out between Bulgaria on one side and Servia and Greece on the other. The Rumanian army mobilized and began its bloodless, yet dominating, march on Bulgaria's capital. July 15 saw Bulgaria beaten by Servia on the west and by Greece on the south, and the Rumanian Army advancing on her capital from the north. July 20 found her appealing to the Czar to use his good offices with a view to the immediate conclusion of hostilities and to the great powers to ascertain from Servia and Greece on what terms peace could be arranged. Rumania took the lead in bringing hostilities to a close, and finally a treaty of peace was signed in her capital, as we have seen, on Aug. 10, 1913—just forty-one days after the war broke out.

It is of interest here to relate what took place in Bucharest, the capital of Rumania, and in Sofia, the capital of Bulgaria, on the evening the treaty was signed, for it will be well to bear these events in mind when I shall presently relate what had taken place between Sofia and Vienna in the week preceding June 30.

In Bucharest King Charles gave a dinner and made a speech to the peace delegates. In Sofia King Ferdinand addressed his army, now to be demobilized.

King Charles said in part:

> As an old man I cannot abstain from testifying my lively admiration for the endurance, abnegation, and bravery shown by your valiant armies during the struggle lasting nearly a year, which ought to insure the free development of your countries and establish stable equilibrium among all of them. The memory of those who paid with their blood for the work of deliverance, jointly undertaken, ought to be honored religiously as a pious duty of gratitude.

King Ferdinand, in speaking to his disbanding army, expressed himself differently:

> Soldiers, at a moment when you were going to return to your homes a fresh scourge descended upon us. Our allies, with whom we have fixed treaties, betrayed us, and tried to snatch from us that which had been redeemed by the blood of tens of thousands of heroes. Indignant at this felony, the entire Bulgarian Nation, from the Chief of State to the last peasant and workman, could not resign themselves to this spoliation. * * *
> Provoked by former allies, we were compelled, against our will, once more to resume a difficult struggle. It would have been crowned with success had not a series of unforeseen political circumstances paralyzed our strength. Pressed on all sides, we were obliged to sign the Treaty of Bucharest, our country not being in a condition to struggle with its five neighbors without risking the loss of everything. Exhausted and tired, but not conquered, we had to furl our glorious standards until better days. * * * Tell your children and your grandchildren about the gallantry of the Bulgarian soldiers and prepare them to complete one day the glorious work that you have begun.

Bulgarian Claims Confuted.

Then, in order that there should be no mistake as to the responsibility for the war, the Sofia Government issued a communiqué to a press agency, declaring that "the Bulgarians took no hostile measures until their advanced posts were suddenly attacked by the Servians," and that "not until Sunday, July 6, did King Ferdinand's Cabinet give up their efforts to preserve peace."

Unfortunately for the long-accepted veracity of these explanations and denials, there is in existence the order issued by the Bulgarian General Staff, which was transmitted to the various Brigade Commanders on June 29, 1913, and which opens with the fateful words:

> "Tomorrow will begin war operations against the Servians and the Greeks."

Only ten days before Servia had humbly appealed to Bulgaria to settle peaceably the territorial question—she had been willing to accept The Hague Tribunal or the Czar of Russia as arbitrator. In spite of all this Bulgaria suddenly made war—made it without declaration or any notice whatsoever.

But did Bulgaria act in this manner?

After I had secured a facsimile of the Bulgarian staff order, I studied the Rumanian "Green Book," which was issued at Bucharest last January, and covers the period from September, 1912, till August, 1913. Herein I found that Rumania, in her excursion into Bulgarian territory, had, undoubtedly, the moral support of Russia, although this moral support was accompanied with a warning from the Russian Foreign Minister, M. Sazonoff, for Rumania not to go too far, since "the overthrow of the Coburg dynasty and the destruction of Bulgaria no power would permit." The warning, as we all know, was heeded. Rumania advanced upon Sofia without hardly being obliged to fire a shot.

The Rumanian "Green Book" mentions as a fact Bulgaria's initiative, but does not explain its origin. But what Bucharest cannot produce Petrograd and the archives of M. Sazonoff can. There M. Nekliudoff, a year ago Russian Minister at Sofia and now accredited to Sweden, has deposited a statement which throws a flood of light on the whole matter. A summary of this statement has been published by The [illegible], the official opposition organ, where it reads as follows:

> Immediately after the conclusion of peace with Turkey at London the Austro-Hungarian Minister at Sofia, Count Tarnovski, proposed to the Bulgarian Government an alliance with the Dual Monarchy. The then Bulgarian Premier, Dr. Daneff, before communicating the proposal to the Cabinet, wished to obtain the opinion of his colleagues concerning the question: Would it not be better to settle the differences with Servia and Greece with arms?
> But the Cabinet declared for a peaceful settlement among the Allies. Dr. Daneff also found the maintenance of the Balkan League the best policy for Bulgaria, and therefore the overtures of Count Tarnovski were politely declined.
> On being informed about this lack of success the Vienna Cabinet sent Count Tarnovski new instructions, enjoining him at any cost to draw Austria-Hungary and Bulgaria nearer to each other.
> Acting upon these instructions, Count Tarnovski asked and was accorded an audience by King Ferdinand, and in a long conversation Count Tarnovski made a specific proposal for an alliance, advising the dismissal of Dr. Daneff's Cabinet.
> King Ferdinand acquiesced, and on June 26 a treaty of alliance between Bulgaria and Austria-Hungary was signed.
> This treaty stipulates that Bulgaria should:
> 1—Denounce all treaties of alliance with Servia, Greece, and Montenegro.
> 2—In the case of war between Austria-Hungary and Servia, or Austria-Hungary and Russia, Bulgaria should mobilize an adequate force in order to paralyze any action by Servia.
> 3—Austria-Hungary binds herself by diplomatic or military action to hinder every attempt by Rumania against Bulgaria in the event of hostilities between Bulgaria and her allies. Further, Austria-Hungary pledges herself to intervene should the war take a turn unfavorable to Bulgaria.
> Now on June 28, thus assured of the assistance of Austria-Hungary, King Ferdinand resolved to give the order for a general attack by the Bulgarian Army on Greece and Servia.
> On being informed about the Austro-Bulgarian alliance M. Sazonoff (the Russian Foreign Secretary) worked quickly to replace Bulgaria by Rumania.
> French and Russian diplomacy proposed Rumanian intervention, guaranteeing her possession of the line Tutrakan-Baltchik.
> Rumania thereupon ordered the mobilization of her army but the Austro-Hungarian Minister at Bucharest, Prince Fürstenberg, handed a note of warning to the Rumanian Cabinet, saying that the Austro-Hungarian Army would cross the Rumanian frontier if the Rumanian Army passed the Danube.
> The Rumanian Cabinet felt embarrassed and quickly interrogated Paris, St. Petersburg, and Berlin. France and Russia, fearing a European war, delayed their answer, and Berlin did not approve the Austro-Hungarian action.
> Kaiser William wired King Charles to act as the mandatory of Germany in the Balkan conflict. At the same time the German Emperor informed the Austro-Hungarian monarch that Germany would not assist Austria-Hungary against Russia if Austria-Hungary did not remain neutral in the Balkan conflict.
> The French Government, on being informed of the German attitude, advised Bucharest to adopt armed intervention without fear of Austro-Hungarian action.

Why Did Not Kaiser Interfere?

It is hard to reconcile the contrition expressed by German statesmen over their Government's violation of Belgian territory, even though they are rapidly establishing an administration there, with the recent Prussian railway expansion with blind terminals a day's march from that frontier. It is harder, in the light of the evidence of an Austro-Bulgarian treaty, to believe in the entire justice of Austria-Hungary's ultimatum to Servia and the solicitation expressed by the Vienna Government for continued Servian independence.

This evidence, however, contains one mitigating clause; it proves that the German Kaiser sixteen months ago placed his restraining hand on Austria-Hungary and thereby prevented that empire from aiding Bulgaria to annihilate Servia, with the inevitable sequel of Russian intervention. Why could he not three months ago, for a second time, have made his influence felt in the same quarter?

The cases are so strikingly similar that an authoritative answer would seem to be a just and proper request and requirement from a sorely puzzled world.

This is a facsimile reproduction of the first and fourth pages of an order issued by the Bulgarian General Staff of June 29, 1913, after the return of King Ferdinand from Vienna. It proves for the first time by documentary evidence that Bulgaria and not Servia or Greece began the second Balkan war. Part of it reads as follows:

> To the commanders of the various troop sections and establishments.
> Village Bagna.
> No. 21.
> 1913 16 VI. (June 29)—8 P. M.
> Tomorrow will begin the war operations against Servians and Greeks.
> Sections of both columns shall tomorrow, at 3 A. M., noiselessly approach the Zletova River and annihilate the outposts of the enemy.
> Thereupon they shall energetically advance upon the objects stipulated.

EUGENE BRIEUX TALKS OF THE DRAMA'S FUNCTION

Author of "Damaged Goods" Declares That the Dramatic Exploitation of Vice Is Revolting—Thanks the Sane Judgment of Americans for Appreciation of His Work.

THERE are two subjects concerning which Americans may reasonably be supposed to ask questions of M. Eugene Brieux, who has come to New York to represent the Académie Française at the meeting of the American Academy of Arts and Letters this week. One, of course, is the war. And the other—equally of course—is his play "Les Avaries," which, under the name "Damaged Goods," was the sensation of last season.

But this author of some eighteen sociological plays, this plump, genial Frenchman who looks like the author of mirthful comedies rather than of bitterly vivid studies of the corruptions of modern civilization, is very, very discreet. He will not talk about the war; he respects, he says, American neutrality, and he does not wish, since his mission here is formal and literary, to discuss subjects that might be considered alien to it.

Will Not Talk War.

"I do not want to talk about the war," he said, as he sat on a lounge in his hotel one morning last week. "It it quite too terrible in itself without dwelling on it. I have just come from Paris. The theatres are all closed, * * * but they will probably be open again soon."

His legs were crossed as he spoke, and he nervously swung one dapper, slippered foot with the curious effect of a gesture. For M. Brieux speaks not only with his lips, but with his whole body—his keen blue eyes, his hands, his shoulders and, actually, with the slippered feet already mentioned.

"I cannot say," he continued, "what effect this war will have on the drama. I have all I can do to speak of the past and the present; I am no prophet! "

But when "Damaged Goods" was mentioned, M. Brieux lost all his nervousness and constraint. He has not forgotten that when, in his native country, the censor forbade the production of that play, America gave it a royal welcome.

"I am very grateful to America," he said, giving the words a cordiality which printer's ink cannot reflect, "for the reception given to 'Damaged Goods.'"

No Exploiter of Vice.

It was not understood correctly at the start in France, but was almost instantly appreciated in the United States. And that was due to the sane judgment of the American public.

"The people of the United States saw that I was not seeking a sensation or a scandal. So I wish to take this opportunity to thank America for taking 'Damaged Goods' in the spirit in which I wrote it."

This naturally led to a mention of some of the objections which certain American publicists had made to the production of "Damaged Goods." M. Brieux was most emphatic in disclaiming any wish to portray vice unless virtue was thereby served.

"Of course," he said, "I understand and sanction plays that are written merely to entertain. But I condemn unsparingly anything of a pornographic nature. I say this unequivocally, and you may repeat it as strongly as the printed word can express it.

"The idea of the dramatic exploitation of vice revolts me, sickens me."

"Which of your plays is your favorite?" asked the reporter. "Is it that early one, 'Blanchette?' Or is it 'Les Hannetons?'"

M. Brieux reflected with a quizzical expression. Then he threw out his hand in a gesture of despair.

"Never ask a father," he said, "which of his children he loves best. Even if he had a preference he would feel bound to keep silent on the subject.

"I consider," he said, turning with relief to one of his favorite topics, "that the drama, like other forms of literature, may legitimately be used as an instrument for the amelioration of social conditions. Of course, this truth has not always been recognized.

"But Diderot, the father of bourgeois drama, knew that it could so be used. And there is Molière—practically all his plays voice a thesis of social import. My life-work is to use the theatre in an endeavor to better conditions, and my sincere wish, my greatest wish, is that at the end of my life there may be a little less suffering on this earth."

There was little of his characteristic vivacity about M. Brieux as he said these words. He spoke simply, but strongly, with a modesty and force that emphasized his sincerity.

And indeed the record of his work shows that the criticism of the social system has always been his aim. "Blanchette," produced in 1892, points out the evil results that sometimes come from the education of girls of the working class; "M. de Reboval" is a scathing attack on hypocrisy, "L'Engrenage" is directed against corrupt politicians, "Les Bienfaiteurs" against fashionable people who play at charity, "L'Evasion" against the superstitious belief in the doctrine of heredity, "Les Trois Filles de M. Dupont" shows the evils of the French system of marriage dowry, "Le Résultat de Courses" is directed against gambling, "La Robe Rouge" tells us that the law sometimes serves injustice, "Les Remplaçants" exhibits the evils of putting children out to nurse, and "Damaged Goods"—but at this date no one needs a description of this play!

M. Brieux is not so modern as to acknowledge no merit in earlier dramatists. Nor does he claim for his generation the discovery of dramatic realism.

"Angier, whom I might call my spiritual father, wrote plays of the most powerful realism," he said, "and was a dramatist who recognized the value of the exact portrayal of life."

M. Brieux is not familiar with the stage settings of Gordon Craig and Max Reinhardt. In general he is in favor of simplicity in presentation. He said:

"An excess of detail or richness in scenic production is actually harmful to a worthy play. It is the word that counts. Mark Antony's speech 'For Brutus is an honorable man' needs no elaborate setting to be effective."

When the names of contemporary dramatists were mentioned, M. Brieux displayed again that discreet reticence with which he had replied to questions about the war.

"I plow my own furrow," he said, "and I have too much to attend to in trying to keep it straight and deep to be able to look at my neighbors and to inspect their work. And I could not, at any rate, express an opinion on the subject of English and American authors, for I read English so poorly that I may not understand and may have missed many good ones. I have heard this one and that spoken of, but only in a haphazard way, so I really am not qualified to give my impressions. If my impressions were unfavorable, I should not be courteous to my colleagues, and if my impressions were favorable, I could not, because of my lack of experience, be sufficiently comprehensive.

Eugenics in France.

"I have never seen the American production of 'Damaged Goods,'" said M. Brieux, in answer to a question. "It may be that 'La Robe Rouge' will be produced under the name 'The Soul of a Judge.' If this play is produced, I certainly shall see it."

The thought of "Damaged Goods" brought the conversation to social problems, and eugenics was mentioned. "I do not know," said M. Brieux, "just how much interest has been taken in eugenics in America, but I know that it is considerable. In France, too, people are interested in eugenics, but not to so great an extent as they are in the United States. However, it will spread.

"France is thinking more and more about eugenics, and, incidentally, she owes much of her stimulation along this line to the contagious influence and enthusiasm of America."

To the rash question as to whether the war would find its reflection in one of M. Brieux's plays the dramatist replied, with a gesture so emphatic that it nearly lifted him from the lounge: "No! I shall certainly not write anything in connection with the war. It affects me too horribly for me to contemplate it. Other writers may do very useful work in writing about the war. But not I!

"If any one were to ask me," said M. Brieux, "if a young country could produce real drama, I would say 'The United States answers the question.' A new, vigorous community can express as powerful a message as an older one, with all its background of experience."

M. Brieux said all this with charming courtesy, with an air, indeed, of leisure, as if he were willing to devote the entire day to entertaining the reporter. But several people were waiting to see him; among them, Prof. Brander Matthews. And to Prof. Matthews, M. Brieux remarked in French: "Will you excuse me a moment longer? I shall soon be at your service. I am undergoing torture!"

Whereupon the torturer withdrew.

AMERICAN PLAYS TOO MECHANICAL, SAYS HUBERT HENRY DAVIES

Too Little Real Psychological Study in Them, Declares Well-Known English Playwright, Who Does Not Believe in Stage Preaching and "Uplift."

BETWEEN the whirlpool of Sentimentality and the jagged rocks of The Uplift is no easy course for the dramatist to steer. But thus only, according to Hubert Henry Davies, can the playwright reach the journey's end of A Good Play. The English dramatist, who has just returned to London after the production of his play, "Outcast," here, has brought us hints for the writing of plays, hopes of an untouched dramatic field, comments of the effect of the war upon the making of drama, and withal some none-too-pleasant criticism of American plays.

But on these two initial prohibitions hangs the law of dramatic Truth as the Foundation for any real achievement in good and serious drama: A playwright must scorn the easy ways of making happy endings. And he must flee the wish to educate and to uplift. A sentimental ending to a realistic play is, in Mr. Davies's opinion, nothing short of immoral.

And, on the other hand, a dramatist must keep himself well in hand and remember that he is a dramatist and not a preacher. The object of a play is not to point a moral, to raise shopgirls' wages, or protest against political corruption, or even to reform divorce laws. A drama may suggest a deep social problem; but it is not the dramatist's business to solve it. And he has no right to set out to show his audience how to be good.

It is easy to see how the straight course between pleasantness and preaching may be very difficult to follow. And it is easy to listen to such advice from Mr. Davies, because he knows exactly what he is talking about. He has had to run the gauntlet of criticism and censure and all manner of serious discussion in London because his own latest play neither ends happily on the one hand, nor attempts to solve the world's most ancient problem on the other.

"A 'happy ending' tagged on to a play that tries to be true," said Mr. Davies, scornfully, while talking to a TIMES reporter. "Why, that is absolutely immoral!

"As for solutions—well, a play is no place to be didactic. The individual has to think out the solutions of his problems for himself. A play is just one thing—the study of a bit of life."

And right there Mr. Davies begins his criticism of American drama. It has its good points, to which he is eager to do full justice; it has produced some remarkably fine and true pieces of work. But on the whole it—this drama that is made in America—does not fulfill the one condition of a "good play"; it is not "the study of a bit of life."

America has its sentimental plays, Mr. Davies says; it has its uplift plays a-plenty. It has many interesting and vigorous and technically excellent melodramas. But, with certain rare and notable exceptions, the American drama is mechanical; its psychology is superficial and conventional, usually quite meaningless; its literary value is negligible; its plot is machine-made. There are many skillful playwrights in this country, Mr. Davies avers. And that, he points out, is exactly what is the matter. There are many talented playwrights; of dramatists we sadly need a few.

Hubert Henry Davies.

"You have splendid actors in this country," said Mr. Davies. "You have the most interested and responsive audiences. You have brilliant writers. What you need is to produce plays that have a sounder basis of psychology. You need more simple humanness in your drama, I think."

It is, of course, in the interests of "humanness" that Mr. Davies is so disdainful of sentimentality and didacticism. But, as he very quickly explains, his condemnation of sentimentality requires some definition.

"I do not mean that a play that is merely sentimental in the first place is all wrong," he said, "because I do not mean to discuss that type of play at all. What I am talking about is the real drama, the drama that aims at a true presentation of life. If you set out simply to tell a pretty story, that is all right. By all means make it a pretty story. But if you set out to give your audience a real picture of life—in other words, if you are trying to write real drama—don't make compromises. In this play of mine I have a woman of the streets working out the actual regeneration of a man who has been on the verge of going to pieces; her own regeneration is worked out, too, and she loves the man. But the man doesn't love her. He loves another woman, and always has, and at the end of the play he does not marry the girl from the streets.

"I have been very much criticised for allowing my play to end without the marriage of these two. And yet it seems to me that to have had the man marry the girl at the end would have been a really immoral thing to do. It wouldn't have been, it seems to me, true. It would have made the whole picture of life meaningless. It was necessary for these two to help each other and be good to each other and work out their own lives as best they could. But a patched-up marriage on the one hand, or a patched-up renewal of the man's first love affair on the other, would have been all wrong.

"And yet it would have been just as bad if I had tried to 'teach a lesson' in this story of a street girl. I suppose that things pretty much like this happen in a good many people's lives. This is a social problem, of course. But it isn't the dramatist's business to set out to tell people how to solve it. The problems of regeneration and the problems of kindness and loyalty are individual problems. A play is a picture of life. And I do firmly believe that a playwright should always try his very best not to preach."

"You don't believe in the uplift in the drama?" remarked the reporter, in Mr. Davies's pause.

"The what?" said the Englishman, and frowned. "What is the uplift?" Then, just as the reporter was about to explain, he laughed. "I see," he said. "That is what you call the didactic play, isn't it? The uplift! I see. How interesting!

"No, I don't believe in the uplift in the drama," he agreed. "I think that a play should simply study life. But I do not think that your American plays study life enough.

"I think that they are good plays of their kind," he added, quickly. "They have force and incident and brilliance. But it seems to me that on the whole the playwright in America lays too much stress on the building up of a mechanical plot and too little on human nature. Psychologically, your plays are superficial. One would think now, to see the purely American plays in New York, that this was a country where the predominant interest was in crooks. Apparently some one wrote a crook play that was successful, and then a great many other people set out to write crook plays, too. These plays are successful, of course, and they are good plays, but they are machine plays."

Mr. Davies knows American life and the American drama well enough to speak with no little authority. He has lived in San Francisco, and he has at various times spent months in New York. He knows a great many Americans in London and Paris, and he goes to see every American play that is produced in his own country.

"The trouble with them is simply that they are mechanical," he repeated. "There is too little real psychological study at the foundation of them all. There isn't enough actual observation behind them. And, too often, they are, it seems to me, not American enough. They don't really reflect, I think, the actual life of your very interesting country. I can't see why they don't. For the life of a country like this is surely interesting enough to study and to write about. What your drama needs is to be humanized.

"Of course, you have had some plays that were notable exceptions to all these criticisms. You have had some fine things. And I personally find a good deal that is interesting in the work of your George Cohan. I don't mean that his plays have any literary value—they haven't; I don't mean that they are the best things that you are producing. But I do think that in these racy sketches that he writes and produces there is the real observation, the actual local color, the human study and portrayal that American drama needs. Mr. Cohan's plays are representative. They couldn't have happened outside of America. They may deal only with a very obvious and perhaps superficial type of life, and, as I said, they have no literary value whatever. But they are human and honest and American, with actual study of people instead of just a mechanical structure. That is why they are good. And if some of your playwrights extend some of that study into other phases of American life you ought to have some very good plays.

"It seems to me that America is just teeming with material for good plays. The life of this country is so full of psychological interest. There must be good human plays everywhere. Why don't more people write them?

"I should like," declared Mr. Davies, with a decisiveness that showed that he had given this matter careful thought, "I should very much like to write a play about America myself!

"Of course, I couldn't do it," he laughed. "That is," he added, genially, "I know enough about America and the Americans, I think, to write a New York play that would go in London. But I couldn't do one that would go in New York. I should be sure to make some dreadful mistake, and my serious drama would be"—he laughed again—"amusing.

"But I do want to write a play about Americans," he added, conclusively. "I want to write a play about Americans abroad. That is untouched dramatic material. And it is intensely interesting. No one has ever done it. No Englishman has ever written about Americans abroad. Yet London is full of Americans, interesting people, with interesting contributions to offer to our life. It is all fascinating.

"You see, you are so very different from us, and so very like us. The supposed mannerisms of the traveling Americans have been done to death, in plays and fiction, and these so-called 'portrayals' of so-called 'types' were very crude and inaccurate. I suppose that no American would recognize the British conception, in fiction and drama, of the 'typical American,' just as no Frenchman would recognize or be amused by the 'typical Frenchman' of the English novel and stage. We aren't amused by American and French versions of English 'characteristics,' either, and we don't find them accurate. They aren't. None of these 'types' is. They are reproductions of tricks of manner that either do not exist or have been grossly exaggerated in the supposed reproduction. We have seen a good many of these 'typical Americans' on the stage; they are invariably from the Middle West; they always have loud voices and crude manners; they continually say, 'I guess.' To the real Americans, as we know those who live in London, these 'types' bear no resemblance at all.

"Now, it may be that many Americans do say, 'I guess.' I personally do not know. But I do know that among the many Americans that I know who live in London or Paris, or equally in New York and one or both of these cities, there are absolutely no 'American mannerisms' at all. These superficial differences between American and English people simply do not exist. Americans talk and act just as English people do. They do not have loud voices. They do not have crude manners. They do not have strange vocabularies. They are perfectly at home in London.

"One noticeable external distinction the American woman abroad does possess. You can always tell an American woman anywhere because she is so exceedingly well dressed. That is the only difference in externals. And yet, there is a difference. There are a great many differences. They are differences of attitude, of idea. They are essentially psychological differences. They are noticeable in Paris, which is full of American men, and in London, which is full of American women. They leave their mark, of course, upon the societies of these cities. They are fascinating things to study and to try to portray—all sorts of nuances.

"Perhaps most Englishmen don't take the trouble to study out any of this at all. At any rate, no one has ever tried to write about it, even in a novel, much less a play. As I said, we have plenty of horrible 'types' that are anything but types, as a matter of fact. The realities we haven't tried to touch. A few Americans have done it in fiction—Mrs. Atherton and Anne Douglas Sedgwick both touch upon this theme, and they both know their ground. But there has never been, so far as I have known, any English attempt to do justice to the American abroad. And it keeps running itself into a play in my mind.

"Of course, the chief difference between Americans and English," said Mr. Davies, in answer to an obvious question, "is that the Americans have so untraditional a point of view. That is their great distinction, and a part of their great charm. They are not bound by any tradition whatever. They are not bound by anything. They have the utmost freedom of viewpoint toward everything in the world. It is all exceedingly attractive.

"And then they are so friendly and genial. There is nothing belligerent about them. They are delightful company, not only because they are interesting, but because they are so amiable. They are so easy to get on with. Every one likes them. At the same time, they have odd little reserves. I often feel that Americans are shocked by the freedom with which we discuss everything in England. In spite of their own liberty of action, their untrammeled attitude toward the world, with no traditions to hold them, they do not actually talk about things as freely as the English.

"Those are only a few attempts at generalizations. They are all interesting little points, I think. Of course, the Americans do not seem like foreigners to me, partly because I have been in America so much and partly because I know so many Americans in London and Paris. Perhaps that is why I am so anxious to put them into a play.

"You see," smiled Mr. Davies, boyishly, "I like them so much!"

It is quite probable that Mr. Davies's American play, when he writes it, will be a very gay and happy sort of drama. But it will not be sentimental. It will make no compromise with tragedy. And it will not try to teach us, or to teach the English, how to behave. As a matter of fact, the English playwright's aversion to didacticism in the drama extends to the point of an earnest dread of being "preachy" in an interview.

"I feel," he complained, "extremely self-conscious." He pressed his fingertips together just under his chin and screwed up his face in a grimace that was a laughable burlesque of a stern pedant. "So," he said, and laughed, "I feel as if I had to—to 'be an author' and talk, for the edification of mankind. It makes one feel exceedingly self-conscious and exceedingly uncomfortable. It is quite as if one were being filmed."

Mr. Davies is a young man, although he has ten plays to his credit, and he began his dramatic career in San Francisco. He came to this country from England in 1893, and lived for eight years in California. In San Francisco he began to write vaudeville sketches, and in 1903, two years after his return to England, he produced in London and promptly sent over to us that delightful comedy "Cousin Kate." Both "The Mollusc" and "A Single Man" have become well known in this country. But the author has gone a long way on the road to uncompromising realism since the days of "Cousin Kate." He holds no brief, to be sure, for tragedy. But he finds the study of life and people, grave things or gay, the only themes worth writing plays about.

NO NEED OF ALARM

For Housewives Over
Foot and Mouth Disease

Meats Should Be Well Cooked and Milk Boiled During Cattle Quarantine, Says Chief Pathologist Mohler of the Government Bureau of Animal Industry.

HOUSEWIVES need not fear the purchase of infected meats in the markets, as the result of the widespread outbreak of foot and mouth disease among cattle, according to expert opinion in the Department of Agriculture. But all meats should be well cooked and all milk should be boiled.

"We have had outbreaks of foot and mouth disease in this country from time to time during the last fifty years, but none to approach the present one in seriousness and extent of spread," said Dr. John R. Mohler, Chief Pathologist of the Bureau of Animal Industry in Washington, to a correspondent of THE TIMES.

"On the worst of previous occasions not more than four States had to be quarantined; this time the drastic precautionary measure has been extended to fifteen States, forbidding the interstate transportation or export of cattle, sheep, swine, the hides and hoofs of such animals, hay, straw, &c.

"We have no means of knowing from what source the epidemic originally started. It was at Niles, Mich., that the disease was first discovered, and investigation proves that it has spread over a large part of the Middle West. Among the States already quarantined are New York, New Jersey, and Delaware, Massachusetts and Rhode Island, Pennsylvania and Maryland. The malady has been carried by infected cattle into Montana.

"Housewives have no need to fear diseased meat in the markets. In the first place, we are rapidly killing off and burying all animals affected by the complaint. Secondly, even though such meat were to find its way to somebody's table, it would be harmless unless eaten raw. Cooking kills the germs.

"On the other hand, people in the quarantined areas would do well to boil their milk—especially that which is given to babies. Raw milk derived from cows sick with foot and mouth disease is dangerous. Boiling is an easy precaution and well worth taking.

"Nobody knows where foot and mouth disease originated, but it has been permanently established in Europe for centuries, and from that source it has been repeatedly introduced into the United States. In one noteworthy instance, however, the serious epidemic of 1898, it appears to have been imported from Japan.

Malady Is Highly Contagious.

"The malady is otherwise known as 'aphthous fever,' or 'eczema epizootica.' It is a highly contagious fever caused by a bacterial germ that has never been identified (probably for the reason that it is too small to be seen by the highest-power microscope), and its most characteristic symptom is an eruption of blisters in the mouth, around the feet above the hoofs, and between the toes.

"Although regarded as in particular a disease of cattle, it readily attacks hogs also, as well as sheep and goats. The buffalo, the camel, the deer, the chamois, the llama, the antelope, and the giraffe are subject to the complaint. Horses, dogs, cats, and even poultry sometime acquire the infection, and help importantly to spread it.

"Man himself is not immune, and human beings in many instances suffer from foot and mouth disease—children especially, as a result of drinking milk from infected cattle. Adults who come into contact with sick animals are liable to contract the malady. In such cases the symptoms resemble those observed in cattle. There is fever and difficulty in swallowing, followed by an eruption of blisters in the mouth and occasionally by a similar breaking-out on the fingers.

"The disease has appeared so seldom in the United States, and outbreaks of it have been so restricted in their spread, that the great losses which it may cause are not appreciated by our people. They have had no experience of an epidemic of sufficient magnitude to illustrate its serious character. Efforts have been made to show that the malady was mild, with a relatively small death-rate, and some surprise has been expressed at the adoption of such radical measure as slaughter. The promulgation of such views, founded upon ignorance, has had the effect of arousing a certain amount of opposition to the work of stamping out the disease on previous occasions, hindering its progress and even jeopardizing its success.

"In Europe, on the other hand, there has been abundant opportunity to become familiar with the disease, which in that part of the world is now dreaded more than any other which affects the farmers' livestock. Even in the mildest outbreaks, when only 2 or 3 per cent. of the grown animals die, there are incidental sources of loss much more important. Affected cows cease to give milk, and the difficulty of chewing the food causes a rapid and extreme loss of flesh. The udders often become inflamed and ruined by the formation of abscesses; inflammation of the feet may cause the horn to drop from the toes, permanently injuring the animal. Altogether there may be a loss of 20 to 50 per cent. of the value of the cattle.

"Sometimes foot and mouth disease assumes a malignant character, causing the death of 5 to 50 per cent. of the adult animals and 50 to 80 per cent. of the sucklings. This has happened within the last few years in Germany, the resulting losses being much greater than from all other contagious maladies of cattle combined. In some sections the cattle have been swept away by tens of thousands, many farms losing from a third to half of their stock. Observation of the malady in European countries, indeed, offers a striking warning of the disastrous effects which might follow the spread of this dangerous infection over the whole extent of the United States. Not only would the immediate losses be gigantic, but the disease might linger for a long period of years. To guard against such a calamity, the most rigid and even severe measures are amply justified.

Quarantine Not Enough.

"The work done during the outbreak of 1902, especially in Massachusetts, demonstrated in a striking manner the efficacy of slaughter in stamping out the complaint and the futility of relying upon quarantine alone. Just so long as any considerable number of diseased animals remain alive, giving off contagion which may be disseminated by people, dogs, cats, rats, chickens, and possibly through other agencies, just so long may the trouble be expected to spread rapidly.

"Unfortunately, when an epidemic occurs, cattle-owners often manifest a disposition to conceal the condition of their herds, thus obstructing the efforts made to extirpate the mischief.

"Up to the present time there have been only a few outbreaks in America, the first one of importance occurring in 1870, when the contagion was introduced from Europe by way of Canada, spreading into the New England States and into New York. The disease on that occasion appears to have assumed a mild form, and its spread was quite easily arrested.

Other Outbreaks.

"About 1880 there were two or three lots of animals brought to this country affected with the complaint, but they were quarantined and danger of an epidemic was forestalled. Again in 1884 there was a small outbreak at Portland, Me., caused by imported cattle, but the malady did not spread beyond a few herds outside of the quarantine station.

"It is not definitely known how the infection was introduced in 1902, but the first herds affected were in Chelsea, Mass., in the vicinity of the docks—indicating that the trouble was brought from Europe by ship.

"Once again it arrived, early in November, 1908, and this time in the neighborhood of Danville, Penn. More accurately speaking, it was first observed in that locality, and a resulting investigation revealed the fact that it was more or less prevalent in a number of counties of Pennsylvania. Within a few days cases of it were found in the vicinity of Akron, N. Y., and a quarantine was declared which included the entire territory of the two States.

"Inquiry developed the fact that the disease had been brought into Pennsylvania by two lots of cattle which came through the stockyards at Buffalo, N. Y. These two shipments were found to have originated in Michigan, New York, and Ohio.

"A few days later a suspicious disease was reported in several herds near Detroit, Mich., and Government inspectors were sent to investigate. As a result, a quarantine of the State of Michigan was declared by the Secretary of Agriculture Nov. 25. Almost immediately thereupon affected animals were discovered in Carroll County, Md., just over the Pennsylvania border, and a quarantine was placed on the State of Maryland.

Methods to Stamp Out Disease.

"An arrangement was made by the Federal and State authorities to work together for the eradication of the plague, the plan followed for stamping out the disease being practically the same as that which had been successful in the case of the New England outbreak of 1902—namely, to enforce a strict quarantine, to discover all infected animals and localities, to slaughter and bury all diseased and exposed animals, and to disinfect the premises occupied by them.

"The owners of condemned animals were reimbursed to the extent of their appraised value, the Federal Government paying two-thirds of the money and the State one-third. Expenses of burial, disinfection, &c., were shared in the same proportion.

"For use in such an emergency, the Bureau of Animal Industry has, as a part of its regular organization, a large force of trained veterinarians, many of whom have had experience in such campaigns. The States, too, have livestock sanitary officials, with laws under which prompt action can be taken.

"The value and importance to the country of an efficient central organization to look after the interests of the livestock industry are well demonstrated on an occasion of this kind. If in 1898 it had been necessary to delay operations in order to organize a force to deal with the outbreak, the contagion would doubtless have spread in the meantime to the Middle West, and probably to the range country of the Far West, where its eradication would have been either impossible or attended with the greatest difficulty and expense.

"As it was, not a day was lost in beginning effective work, and the disease practically was confined to the areas to which it already had spread at the time of discovery.

"Besides the work of slaughter, burial, and disinfection, veterinary inspectors were sent to trace all rumors of foot and mouth disease, and to locate any probable centres of infection.

"A large force was maintained in the infected regions, and thorough and systematic inspection and re-inspection were made of all animals from farm to farm. The Bureau of Animal Industry had engaged in the work of inspection and eradication a total of 572 employes, of whom 159 were veterinarians.

Disinfection of Premises.

"The work of disinfecting premises is difficult and tedious, various methods being employed according to local conditions.

"Where it is conducted on a large scale, a water tank filled with a 3 per cent. chlorinated lime solution is used with a steam pump, the steam being furnished in some instances by a traction engine. In cleaning and disinfecting barns and stables, the wooden fittings and flooring are as a rule torn out and burned, and the disinfectant is then freely sprayed over walls and ceilings. In some cases fumigation is preferred for the interior of barns containing great quantities of hay or other material which would be damaged or ruined by other methods.

"Railroad cars that have carried infected or suspected animals are cleaned and disinfected; also any stockyards that may happen to be in the infected areas.

"By no means the least interesting feature of the outbreak of 1908 was its origin, which at first was a mystery. Inasmuch as the Bureau of Animal Industry maintained a strict quarantine on imported livestock, and in view of the fact that the importation of ruminants from countries where foot and mouth disease existed was prohibited entirely, it was considered highly improbable that the infection had been introduced with imported animals. Various other theories were suggested, one of them being that the contagion might have been brought on the clothing of immigrants.

"Before long, however, it was ascertained definitely that the epidemic had started near Detroit, and further investigation traced the disease to calves that had been used in propagating smallpox vaccine by an establishment in that city.

Traced to Japanese Vaccine.

"This led to a suspicion that the vaccine produced by this outfit was contaminated by the virus of foot and mouth disease—an idea which was presently confirmed beyond the peradventure of a doubt by scientific experiments with the vaccine in question. Healthy calves inoculated with the vaccine developed foot and mouth disease.

"Further inquiry developed the fact that the Detroit firm had obtained this particular strain of vaccine from a concern in Pennsylvania, and tests made of the vaccine produced by the latter firm showed that it was likewise contaminated with germs of foot and mouth disease.

"The Pennsylvania concern had got its vaccine virus in Japan six years earlier, and all the evidence pointed to the conclusion that the New England outbreak of 1902 was attributable to the same cause—i. e., the same lot of Japanese vaccine.

"As soon as the facts as to the contamination of the vaccine became known, immediate steps were taken by the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service to eradicate all this contaminated vaccine virus in America.

"The licenses of the two firms were at once suspended, all the suspected vaccine virus on hand at their establishments was destroyed, and all such vaccine on the market was withdrawn and destroyed. The Public Health Service then proceeded to examine every strain of vaccine virus on the market, and to require all manufacturers of such vaccine to test their virus for the presence of foot and mouth infection. As a result, the Government is now able to give assurance that there is on the market no vaccine virus thus contaminated.

"Unlike most other infectious maladies, foot and mouth disease may attack the same animals repeatedly. The immunity derived from an attack is manifestly of a very limited duration. Hence inoculation with the virus as a protective measure is of no use. Although the germ has not been isolated and identified, it undoubtedly exists in vast numbers in the serum of the blisters on mouth, feet, or udder, in the saliva, the milk, and even in the blood.

"Consequently, the infection is easily and rapidly spread. Animals may be infected directly, as by licking, and in the case of calves by suckling; or indirectly by manure, hay, utensils, drinking troughs, railway cars, barnyards, and pastures. Human beings may carry the virus on their clothing, and transmit it from their hands while milking. Milk may communicate the disease to animals fed with it.

"When an outbreak occurs in a herd, the owner should make every effort to keep other animals from coming into contact with his cattle.

"This remark applies especially to dogs, cats, goats, and poultry, which having access usually to the stables and barnyards, furnish excellent agencies for disseminating the plague.

"The owner should be equally careful not to admit any person to the stable or other place where the diseased cattle are kept—particularly a person having to do with cattle elsewhere.

"Quarantine works well as far as it goes, and is an important precautionary measure; but in a country like the United States, where an infection of this kind is liable to spread rapidly by means of cars, manure, hay, and other feed, and where the results of its obtaining a firm foothold would be so disastrous, this restrictive method is too slow and tedious.

"More radical steps are demanded, in order to suppress and eradicate completely the menace in the quickest and most thorough manner possible. It is therefore best to go directly to the root of the trouble by purchasing and slaughtering all affected or exposed cattle.

"An outbreak of foot and mouth disease may quickly result in direct losses amounting to many millions of dollars. But, in addition to this, a considerable spread of the contagion in this country would entail the entire stoppage of our export trade in live animals, interruptions of domestic commerce, and quarantines, which would involve losses far exceeding those caused by the ravages of the disease.

LETTERS OF SOLDIERS

Give Vivid Pictures
Of Realities of War

Unknown English Chroniclers Tell of the Human Side of the Great Conflict in Letters Sent to Their Homes Without a Thought of Having Them Published.

A GERMAN cavalry division was pursuing a division of English infantry. The English ranks were suddenly reinforced; they turned and charged the Germans, who fled in disorder.

All the Germans fled—but one. Says an English soldier, Trooper S. Cargill:

When they saw us coming they turned and fled, at least all but one, who came rushing at us with his lance at the charge. I caught hold of his horse, which was half mad with terror, and my chum was going to run the rider through when he noticed the awful glaze in his eyes, and we saw that the poor devil was dead.

That ghastly vision of the mounted corpse can find no place in histories of this war. It has no historical significance even if it did receive a place in the cable dispatches from the front. Only from the lips of soldiers or from their pens when they snatch a few moments from the business of war to write to their people at home come such naively graphic accounts of trivial but illuminative incidents.

In many an American family is treasured a packet of yellow papers, on which are written in ink fast fading away brief and intimate impressions of the civil war by men who waged it. Every war has thus its unknown, unhonored chroniclers, who send to their little home circles narratives that for startling realism no highly paid special correspondent could surpass.

Trooper Cargill's letter is one of a number contained in an extraordinary volume just published by the George H. Doran Company of New York, with the title "In the Firing Line." (50 cents net.) Mr. A. St. John Adcock collected a large number of letters sent home during the last few weeks by English soldiers fighting in France and has arranged them to form what is perhaps the most essentially human account of the great war that has yet appeared.

"Light Brigade" Over Again.

Consider, for instance, the narrative of Private Whitaker of the Coldstream Guards. He fought through the terrific four-day battle near Mons, and his account of it follows. It must be remembered that the British troops who took part in that battle had sailed from Southampton only four days before:

You thought it was a big crowd that streamed out of the Crystal Palace when we went to see the Cup Final. Well, outside Compiègne it was just as if that crowd came at us. You couldn't miss them. Our bullets plowed into them, but still they came for us. I was well intrenched, and my rifle got so hot I could hardly hold it. I was wondering if I should have enough bullets when a pal shouted, "Up, Guards, and at 'em!" The next second he was rolled over with a nasty knock on the shoulder. He jumped up and hissed, "Let me get at them!" His language was a bit stronger than that.

When we really did get the order to get at them we made no mistake, I can tell you. They cringed at the bayonet, but those on our left wing tried to get around us, and after racing as hard as we could for quite five hundred yards we cut up nearly every man who did not run away.

You have read of the charge of the Light Brigade. It was new to our cavalry chaps. I saw two of our fellows who were unhorsed stand back to back and slash away with their swords, bringing down nine or ten of the panic-stricken devils. Then they got hold of the stirrup-straps of a horse without a rider and got out of the melée. This kind of thing was going on all day.

In the afternoon I thought we should all get bowled over, as they aimed for us again in bulk big numbers. Where they came from goodness knows; but as we could not stop them with bullets they had another taste of the bayonet. My Captain, a fine fellow, was near to me, and as he fetched them down he shouted, "Give them socks, my lads!" How many were killed and wounded I don't know; but the field was covered with them.

It is also of the four days' battle that Private J. R. Taft of the Second Essex Regiment wrote. How typical of real life, as distinct from romance, is his ready transition from his devout thanksgiving for his safety to his amused recollection of the popular song that rose above the crash of shot and shell:

We were near Mons when we had the order to intrench. It was just dawn when we were half way down our trenches, and we were on our knees when the Germans opened a murderous fire with their guns and machine guns.

We opened a rapid fire with our Maxims and rifles; we let them have it properly, but no sooner did we have one lot down than up came another lot, and they sent their cavalry to charge us, but we were there with our bayonets, and we emptied our magazines on them. Their men and horses were in a confused heap. There were a lot of wounded horses we had to shoot to end their misery.

We had several charges with their infantry, too. We find they don't like the bayonets. Their rifle shooting is rotten; I don't believe they could hit a haystack at 100 yards.

We find their field artillery very good; we don't like their shrapnel; but I noticed that some did not burst; if one shell that came over me had burst I should have been blown to atoms. I thanked the Lord it did not. I also heard our men singing that famous song, "Get Out and Get Under." I know that for an hour in our trench it would make any one keep under, what with their shells and machine guns. Many poor fellows went to their death like heroes.

The writer of the following letter, too, was telling of Mons. To friends far away, at peaceful Barton-on-Humber, he wrote:

Just a line to tell you I have returned from the front, and I can tell you we have had a very trying time of it. I must also say I am very lucky to be here. We were fighting from Sunday, 23d, to Wednesday evening, on nothing to eat or drink—only the drop of water in our bottles which we carried.

No one knows—only those that have seen us could credit such a sight, and if I live for years may I never see such a sight again. I can tell you it is not very nice to see your chum next to you with half his head blown off. The horrible sights I shall never forget. There seemed nothing else only certain death staring us in the face all the time. I cannot tell you all on paper. We must, however, look on the bright side, for it is no good doing any other.

There are thousands of these Germans, and they simply throw themselves at us. It is no joke fighting seven or eight to one. I can tell you we have lessened them a little, but there are millions more yet to finish.

With the Bluejackets.

Of the battle that reddened the foam of the North Sea during the last days of August many a seaman recorded his impressions. And what curious things stuck in the memories of the weary, powder-stained survivors! "The funny thing which you should have seen," wrote Midshipman Hartley to his parents, "was all the stokers grubbing around after the action looking for bits of shell." And a seaman on H. M. S. Hearty wrote:

Two cooks were in the galley of the Arethusa, just having their rum, when a shell killed one and blew the other's arm off. A funny thing, they've got a clock hanging up; it smashed the glass and one hand, but the blooming thing's still going.

There is fine realism in Seaman Gunner Bennett's letter to the parents who waited for tidings in their cottage on the Isle of Wight:

We and another ship in our squadron came across two German cruisers. We routed one and started on the second, but battle-cruisers soon finished her off. Another then appeared, and after we had plunked two broadsides into her she slid off in flames.

Every man did his bit, and there was a continuous stream of jokes. We pencilled on the projectiles "Love from England." "One for the Kaiser," and other such messages. The sight of sinking German ships was gloriously terrible, funnels and masts lying about in all directions, and amidships a huge furnace, the burning steel looking like a big ball of sulphur. There was not the slightest sign of fear, from the youngest to the oldest man aboard.

But it remained for a naval Lieutenant, whose name is not given, to describe, in a letter to a friend, one of the most remarkable incidents of the war, an incident which might have occurred in the imagination of Jules Verne or of H. G. Wells in his youth. He wrote:

The Defender having sunk, an enemy, lowered a whaler to pick up her swimming survivors; before the whaler got back an enemy's cruiser came up and chased the Defender, and thus she abandoned her whaler. Imagine their feelings—alone in an open boat without food, twenty-five miles from the nearest land, and that land the enemy's fortress, with nothing but fog and foes around them. Suddenly a swirl alongside and up, if you please, pops his Britannic Majesty's submarine E-4, opens his conning tower, takes them all on board, shuts up again, dives, and brings them home 250 miles!

In his introduction to the book St. John Adcock calls the private letters of the soldiers "the most potent of recruiting literature." Undoubtedly this is true of some of them. The casual, almost flippant, records of splendid heroism, the reflection of a spirit of gay courage, the description of the most picturesque and romantic aspects of battle—these tend, certainly, to fill the mind of stay-at-home readers with a desire for participation in this great adventure.

Wholesale Slaughter.

But, on the other hand, such passages as: "The dead were piled up in the trenches about ten deep, and there were trenches seven miles long," and "Our Maxim gun officer tried to fix his gun up during their murderous fire, but he got half his face blown away," are not likely to make fighting seem a pleasant occupation. It is true that the dead referred to in the first of these passages are the enemy's dead; still, there is a wholesale quality about those seven-mile trenches filled with dead ten deep that is not a recruiting allurement.

Nor is this letter, vivid in its realism, likely to make those not already warlike eager to enlist. It was sent to his parents at Ilfracombe by Private William Burgess of the Royal Field Artillery:

We left our landing place for the front on the Tuesday and got there on Saturday night. The Germans had just reached Liège then, and we got into action on the Sunday morning. The first thing we did was to blow up a bridge to stop the Germans from crossing. Then we came into action behind a lot of houses attached to the main street. We were there about ten minutes when the houses started to fall around us. The poor people were buried alive. I saw poor children getting knocked down by bursting shells.

The next move was to advance across where there was a Red Cross Hospital. They dropped shells from airships and fired on it until the place was burnt down to the ground. Then they got a big plan on to retire and let the French get behind them. We retired eight miles, but we had to fight until we were forced to move again. We got as far as Le Cateau on Tuesday night. We camped there until 2 o'clock next morning.

Then we all heard there was a big fight coming off, so we all got together and cleared the field for action. (The letter mentions the numbers of men engaged, and states that the Germans were in the proportion of three to one.) We cut them down like rats. We could see them coming on us in heaps and dropping like hail. The Colonel passed along the line and said "Stick it, boys."

I tell you, mother, it was awful to see your own comrades dropping down—some getting their heads blown off and others their legs and arms. I was fighting with my shirt off. A piece of shell went right through my shirt at the back and never touched me. It stuck into a bag of earth which we put between the wheels to stop bullets.

We were there, all busy fighting, when an airship came right over the line and dropped a bomb, which caused a terrible lot of smoke. Of course, that gave the Germans our range. Then the shells were dropping on us thick. We looked across the line and saw the German guns coming toward us. We turned our two centre guns on them and sent them yards in the air. I reckon I saw one German go quite twenty yards in the air.

Just after that a shell burst right over our gun. That one got me out of action. I had to get off the field the best way I could. The bullets were going all around me on the way off; you see, they got completely around us. I went about two miles and met a Red Cross cart. I was taken to St. Quentin Hospital. We were shelled out of there about 2 in the morning, and then taken in a train and taken down to a plain near Rouen. Next morning we were put in a ship for dear old England.

LOUIS N. PARKER TELLS HOW TO WRITE A PLAY

With Whimsicality and Satire the British Playwright Discourses of His Craft—He Sets Forth Some of the Deadly Dramatic Sins and Gives Some Hints for Dodging Failure.

By Louis N. Parker.

TO write a play—it is almost the easiest thing in the world. The only easier thing is not to write a play, but that no one has had the courage to try. At any rate, I have never yet met any one from a Bishop to a tram-conductor, including the other sex between these extremes, who had not at some period written a play, or, at least, meditated writing one. In acute cases they had the manuscript on their persons.

I was once on what I thought might possibly be my death-bed, though it subsequently turned out otherwise, and my doctor, who until then had seemed perfectly respectable, shyly produced a brown-paper parcel and asked me to cast my eye over it and give him my opinion. He said there was just time.

The first thing to do when, as they say, "commencing playwright," is to acquire a cottage on Hindhead, borrow a motor car, and be photographed in the one outside the other. Or you can be photographed golfing—"addressing the ball," I believe it is called. But that is less advantageous, as it shows more of you. This picture you will have published with the legend: "Mr. Foljambe-Blore, the eminent playwright, in his 80 H. P. Panhard at the door of his cottage on Hindhead, resting after completing his play 'The Folly of Virtue,' which is now being considered by several London managers." Then you are a playwright.

But if you insist upon performing a work of supererogation and really writing an alleged play, the process is longer, though not necessarily more difficult. You take an idea. Take it wherever you find it. Ideas come in conversations with a friend—from the friend. Many plays have been written after conversations with me—plays which would have made their authors' fortunes if they had not been complete failures. Some authors deny that any idea is necessary, and prove the correctness of their theory.

Having got your idea from somewhere you must next make up your mind whether you mean to write for a paying public or for deadheads. Deadheads are the earnest students of drama who never pay. If you want to see them seek the platform of any suburban station—West Kensington for choice—at 7 o'clock on any evening. It is crowded with them. They wear a sort of national costume—the ladies knitted shawls and the gentlemen cloth caps. If you elect to write for the paying public you will probably find you have written for the deadheads after all.

But if you deliberately write for the deadheads you will not be hailed as a playwright, but as a very great playwright, as one of the ornaments of English dramatic literature. The drama is one of the arts in which complete failure to attract a public is the true test of genius. The moment you have unhappily stumbled upon a subject which people like, you are spurned by the litterati, and you go about apologizing for yourself. You must make up your mind whether you want to be truly great, or truly solvent.

The choice of an idea for a play is, after all, no such difficult matter, as there is only one. All dramatic art resolves itself into the question of how many acts it takes to marry Edwin to Angelina, or, in our modern way, to divorce Angelina from Edwin, which, however, amounts to the same thing, as Angelina subsequently marries another Edwin whose name is Bertie. You may disguise this subject as you like by pretending to make your central theme the Housing of the Poor, or Tariff Reform, but in the end Angelina marries or is divorced from Edwin just the same. You can also be very bold and suppress the marriage ceremony. Then you are ultra modern. But the ultimate result remains identical, unless your theme be neo-Malthusianism, though it may not appear in the first column of The Times.

Censoring's the Thing.

Do not be afraid. Remember that a first play is always, invariably, and without exception, a glorious and glittering triumph, especially if it is not played. There is nothing that will enhance a beginner's fame as to get himself censored. Then he is a made man, and his fame travels from one end of the country to the other. It is not difficult to get censored. Then you write to the papers. You need scarcely take even this trouble. A hundred people will write to the papers about you. Nothing arouses the indignant enthusiasm of the earnest playgoer so much as the censoring of a play he would not pay a shilling to see. You become a National Question, a Pivot of the Constitution. Magna Charta is dragged in, and somebody totally acquainted with the drama writes an article "Ichabod." You also become an argument in favor of a National Theatre.

Having got your idea, the next thing is to find a title. That is perhaps even more important than the idea. The great point about a title is how it will look on the 'buses. A play of mine (excuse me) was very nearly a failure out West because they thought the title meant a new breakfast food. It was called "Disraeli." You see what a thin line divides success from failure. A good title—that is, a taking one—is more than half the play. "The Worst Woman in London" is a stroke of genius. We all want to see her. Our sympathies go out to her in a rush. We feel we love her. We expect much of her. The French are the masters in the art of inventing titles. "La Femme Nue." Think of it. To be sure, that was disappointing, as the play turned out to be psychological instead of physiological.

The title need have no connection with the play. You can write a politico-economical pamphlet, and call it "Julius Caesar." Or you can write a medical pamphlet and call it "On and Off," and if it is more off than on, you have no idea what a crowd of brilliant creatures will swoop on the opportunity. The good title means nothing, but looks portentous. You should also consider, and perhaps modify, your own name. Everywhere, except in America, names are food for mirth, and if you happen to be called Mark Anthony Brown, the wits will remind you of it. Not once, but forever.

However, having got your idea, or somebody else's, and your title, you next proceed to the construction of your play. The most modern school deny the necessity of construction at all. Their plays have no beginning, no middle, and, unfortunately, a long-delayed end. The end is the only attractive part. But I am old-fashioned and I stick to construction. It is one of the most fascinating points about a play because it is impossible.

In constructing a play you have to keep one eye on the audience all the time; possibly it is the only occasion on which there will be an audience to keep an eye on.

Let Them Get Seated.

The first rule you have to observe is not to begin until the curtain has been up long enough to allow your audience to get into their seats. It is one of our most hallowed national customs not to go into a theatre until the curtain has risen. If by some stupid blunder we have arrived punctually we smoke a cigarette in the lobby. So the cunning playwright takes care not to start his story until at least five minutes later. You will occupy these five minutes with a colorless scene of some kind, just to keep the groundlings amused. In some cases you will begin each act in the same way. It depends on how fashionable your audience is and how thirsty.

While I am on this point, I may as well say that for a converse reason you must finish your play five minutes before the final curtain falls. Another of our national customs is to get up and leave the theatre the moment Edwin has embraced Angelina, although the author may have reserved a quaint comedy touch or a dramatic surprise for the actual end. It is no use altering the hour of performance. Begin at midnight if you like; we shall not come until five minutes after. Leave off at 10; we shall go out five minutes before. It's in the blood. The idea that an audience owes any consideration to authors or actors is entirely foreign to us. The very suggestion of it is almost an impertinence. Why, even when a great conductor like Hans Richter forbids us to clatter to our seats during the introduction to "Parsifal," we only obey with an amused toleration. "These musicians!" Think of the colossal row there would be if a theatrical manager issued a similar edict!

Whatever you do, take yourself seriously, otherwise nobody else will. Be interviewed. And, when you are interviewed, take care to stage-manage yourself properly: "'Yes,' said Mr. Foljambe-Blore, when we inter cepted him as he smoked a gold-tipped cigarette between two rehearsals, 'the drama in England is, as you say, in a hopeless condition; but I trust this play may show that there are still some earnest workers who have its highest interests at heart. The subject? There is no subject. It is just a slice of real life cut raw and bleeding. There are only three characters: a man who works all day, another who works all night. Yes—toilers—toilers. And then, of course, the woman who deceives both. The crash comes when they discover her treachery. How do I bring that about? By the simplest means. One of them is given an unexpected holiday. How do I solve the problem? Problems are never solved. How did I get the idea? Who knows? I was motoring in the Pyrenees' (flavor this according to taste) 'when, &c., &c. This is a new subject? Yes, I hope so. What did you say? Box and Cox? What are Box and Cox? Have I any special message for your readers? No, no; except that I hope this work of mine may convey a much-needed lesson to this London of ours. What are my future plans? Ah! First, a much-needed—no, I said that just now—a highly necessary rest. Yes, I hope to see you in my villa near Florence. Then I may get to work on a play which I hope may convey a much-needed message—' At this moment the leading actor came up hat in hand to consult the celebrated author on the pronunciation of a word. 'You see,' said the latter, passing a weary hand over his thoughtful brow, 'one is much harassed, much harassed.' The interview was at an end."

Louis N. Parker.

And the run of the play was at an end three nights later.

Collaboration has many advantages, one of which is that you needn't do any of the work; but you should be careful of your choice of a collaborator. The man who marries loses a sweetheart; the man who collaborates loses a friend; it is difficult to avoid the impression that he gets all the coppers while you get all the kicks. If the play be a success he will acknowledge he wrote it. If it be a failure, you will acknowledge he wrote it. If any one asks either of you which really wrote it, you will both look pained and surprised, and answer: "What do you think?" All your lives, you will let slip the words "My play," and all your lives you will be ashamed of doing so.

Poor Old Shakespeare!

Nor can I advise you to dramatize a novel. If it had 5,000 readers, there are 500,000 people who will say what a bad job you've made of it. To be sure, you won't mind that if they all pay to see it.

Remember that the manager's reader judges a play by the first two pages of the manuscript. If he doesn't like these, he writes you an extremely polite note to the effect that he has read your play with perfectly hysterical delight, but it is, unfortunately, scarcely suited to his theatre. Therefore, you must try to arouse his interest the moment he opens the play. Shakespeare had his eye on the manager's reader when he made Horatio whisper: "What! Has this thing appeared again tonight?" That gripped the poor man, and he was forced to read on. On the other hand, I must remind you that no audience ever gets into the theatre until five minutes after the curtain has risen, so, as I have already told you, you must delay the real beginning of your play. This is one out of the faggot of cleft sticks you will find yourself in when you write a play. In all other respects Shakespeare is a bad model, as it is universally agreed he did not know the rudiments of his craft. Not one play of his is ever played—I will not say exactly, but approximately—as he wrote it.

It is a notorious fact that there is no one, whatever his nationality or however shadowy his education or limited his intellect, who is not perfectly equipped to alter, transpose, arrange, and adapt Shakespeare's crude and amateurish efforts. Write a play, indeed! Why, he couldn't even write the simplest sentence of four words in so clear a manner as not to render it open to 75,000 different readings. We are still in doubt as to whether his most representative hero was mad or sane, or madly sane or sanely mad. Indeed, Shakespeare was so vague an artificer that some are in doubt as to whether he wrote plays at all.

Do not, however, carry this desire for a striking effect too far. I was asked to read a play once—and this is a fact. It was a five-act tragedy, and with liberal allowance for intervals for much-needed refreshment it would have played nearly an hour. The first act represented the utterly dark interior of a cavern in the heart of the Caucasus. It was, very superfluously, night. There was to be deep silence during the first five minutes after the curtain had risen. Then a voice proceeding from an unseen speaker at the back of the cavern began. And continued. It gave us an agonizing history of the speaker's sufferings. It went on for ten minutes and ended as nearly as I can remember: "And must I, the last descendant of the Badenweilers, nursed in all the luxury which untold wealth can lavish on its favorite, must I perish here, deprived of a loving mother's solicitous attention, in squalor and anguish, with noisome nocturnal fowl for companions?" (He groans. Curtain.)

That is carrying originality and the search after dramatic effect too far. Perhaps. Who knows? This very boldness might have won an audience's enthusiasm.

You Never Can Tell.

For, oh, my students, take this well to heart. There is no foretelling the success or failure of any play that was ever written. It is impossible to write well enough to insure success. It is impossible to write badly enough to insure failure. Fine plays fall miserably, and bad ones run a million nights. And there is no expert. In all the universe there never has been, there is not, and there never will be, one man who can foretell the fate of a play. If there were, what a fortune he would make. Trust nobody's opinion, for whether it be good or bad, it is equally worthless. A playwright whose name wild horses shall not drag from me was more than once told by managers, actors, and even the cold-blooded business manager, he had written a Heaven-sent masterpiece which must run a year to maximum receipts. Simply couldn't help itself. On the strength of their opinion, he ran about the city and grinned like a dog; and the play was howled off on the first night.

On the other hand, a play by the same nameless author was utterly condemned in its production. The stage manager—a person of vast experience who "produces" twenty-five plays every season—took him aside and said: "If there is one thing I do know, it is our public. I'm sorry to have to tell you they won't stand your play. Not a week, Sir!" The entire company was told the same thing. Parts in the next play were distributed among them with instructions to learn them at once. The author was left dead, while the staff rushed to the telegraph to order the new scenery. That was in January of 1911, and the play is still running.

Don't be long. Be as short as you can. It is better to be as short as you can than to be as short as other people can make you. We are rapidly adopting the telegraphic style. An audience has no sooner got into the theatre than it is on tenter-hooks to get out again. Have you not read the pathetic paragraph which invariably appears on the third morning of a new play's existence: "'The Folly of Virtue,' which began at 8:30, now begins and 9:10, and, instead of leaving off at 11:15, ends punctually at 10:45"?

There are a thousand of other details. Your hero must always enter from the centre of the background. So must your heroine. It is no use telling me you want them to enter from the side. They won't do it. If there is no door in the centre of the background you must cut one, even if it opens on the bottomless abyss. You must never under any circumstances ask your hero and heroine to stand or sit with their profiles to the audience. Consequently your hero must breathe his passion into your heroine's back hair. It is a form of address entirely confined to the stage; yet it always fulfils its purpose, for observe that the heroine does not even turn around to answer him; she merely gasps three times and sinks helplessly backward into his arms. Your hero must seldom sit down; never on the furniture provided for that purpose. He may sit on the arm of a chair, on the pedestal of a statue, on cathedral steps, or on the corner of a table. The latter is his favorite perch. Then he can swing one leg and show his sock.

Your hero never leaves his hat in the hall; he always brings it with him into the drawing room, where at last the footman takes it from him. If he have gloves on he takes them off, but if he have no gloves on he puts them on at once. Your hero or heroine must never come unawares. You must prepare their entrance. Even if the characters on the stage have never heard of them, yet the dialogue must be premonitory: "I see some one coming up the garden path." "Who can it be?" "How nobly he treads!"—this in the case of a hero. "How she floats along the ground! The daisies scarcely bend under her weight!"—this in the case of the heroine. "His brow is clouded," or sunny, pensive, sad, as the case may be. "She seems to bring the Spring in her train." And then let us get into corners, crouch along the walls, climb onto the furniture in order to leave the central entrance open for him or her.

Then the footman appears at the side door and announces Somebody Something. There is an appreciable pause, to allow the audience to consult their programme, and then the Great One enters; not where the footman has announced him, but out of the bottomless abyss up centre, and comes down the whole length of the stage without noticing any one on it while the audience greets its old favorite with frenzied shouts.

You may ask what becomes of the drama at such a moment. The drama, my dear friends, goes to Sheol. By the time one of these enthusiastic receptions is over, the audience and the actors have the greatest difficulty in remembering what the drama was about, or where they are, or what they are doing.

May I warn you against what I consider an unwise proceeding? I think it is injudicious to invite your friends prematurely to a glorious supper after the first performance. It is intended to celebrate a joyful occasion, and the occasion is too often apt to turn out surprisingly otherwise. I know no form of entertainment quite so dismal as a supper after a fiasco. Most of your invited guests shirk it, and stay away, so that your table looks as if it had been to the dentist. Others are discreetly sympathetic, and that is dreadful. All of them avoid your eye, and talk very fast about purely external matters. Your own cheery spirits are the cheery spirits of a galvanized corpse. Believe me, call no author happy until after the last act, and scarcely even then; a play may endure for a night, but the Press cometh in the morning.

Hope Springs Eternal.

Have I seemed to be laughing at my own trade? Never think that. It is a good trade. Everybody belittles it, but everybody strives to be in it. The very limitations that hamper it—and I have not told you the hundredth part of them—make it fascinating. The insuperable difficulties, the achievement of the impossible, are the only things that make life worth living. I have shown you quite clearly, I hope, how to write a play. I have also shown you that no one knows how to write a good play. If they did nobody would write plays at all, for we should all have retired to our mansions in Park Lane. But on, my brothers, we are all trying. And when next you witness what you unanimously decide is the very worst play you have ever seen, remember that one unhappy man thought it was the best play he had ever written. Leave off cursing the author, and drop a silent tear on the man.

The novelist sends out his book, and the friends to whom he has given free copies to read at least tell how great it is. To be sure, there are days when he does not get his morning paper, because his wife has intercepted the bad notice, and lies in a good cause. So time passes, and the failure of the book falls on him gradually, like a cooling Autumn shower. The playwright has to face an audience of 1,500 people at once and take his chance. If he have failed, the 1,500 howl at him as a lynching mob howls at the horse-thief it is about to string up, and the cruel notices come, not in driblets, but in one full swoop. And yet, and yet, and yet—the very night of his Waterloo, if he be a true man and a true playwright, he goes home and lays out his foolscap—oh, the irony of words!—and mends his quill, and, with a brave flourish, writes the title of his next play. The other is dead—the next shall carry him to the stars.

AMONG NEW YORK'S POLITICIANS OF YESTERDAY

Anecdotes About Bygone Elections Which Came Out at a Recent Dinner Given by an Old-Timer

THERE was a dinner party not long ago at the residence uptown of an old-time politician where some reminiscences of former days were given. Two of the reminiscences related to three men well known in public life in the seventies.

The first anecdote concerned a hot election for Assemblyman in New York City. It seems that in the election of 1872, in the then Seventeenth Assembly District, in which the Hudson River Railroad freight yard is located, Thirtieth Street, near Ninth Avenue, the candidates were William T. Graff, Republican, and Andrew J. Blessing, Democrat. Blessing was a hustler for votes. Just a few minutes before the polls were to close he found himself near a polling place within a stone's throw of the railroad yard and espied an engineer, a friend of his, stepping off his engine. Blessing rushed over to him. He little knew of what importance that engineer's vote was.

"Have you registered, John?" Blessing blurted out as he gasped for breath after his fast run across the street.

"Sure I have."

"And you've just come in and haven't voted yet? Get a big move on you, rush over there and vote for me; this is your election district. Hurry!"

"Bah! What's the good of my one vote, Andy? You'll be elected by 500 majority, everybody says."

"Come along, anyhow," persisted Blessing, seizing the engineer by the shoulder and dragging him over to the polling place. John's vote had scarcely dropped into the ballot box when the polls were officially declared closed, and the canvassers went to work at the count.

Now, it so happened that Blessing, being a practical man, without sentiment, had taken care to cast a vote for himself. Graff, on the contrary, had believed that it would be gracious on his part not to vote for himself, so he voted for all Republican candidates except Assemblyman, for which he voted a blank ballot. The Board of County Canvassers' official figures as to the result were: Blessing, Democrat, 3,135; Graff, Republican, 3,134.

The second reminiscence dealt with an incident in the Mayoralty election of 1872 in New York, the Republican candidate receiving only 4 votes out of 200 cast in the Twentieth Election District of the Second Assembly District. The candidate of the G. O. P. was the late William F. Havemeyer, who had been elected Mayor in 1845 and again in 1848. His friends began an inquiry to find out why he had received so few votes in the election district in question.

The two candidates opposing the Republican were Abraham R. Lawrence, Tammany, and James O'Brien, Apollo Hall Democracy. In those days the big ballot was not used; there was instead a small ballot (with a few exceptions) for each candidate. On the outside of the folded ballot was printed in large type the name of the office, and inside, in small type, was the name of the candidate.

The two chief parties in the city got out their own ballots, and each had the outside type of an individual design. These ballots were distributed from party booths near the polling places. It is said that the voter, in nine cases out of ten, took his lot of party tickets as they were handed to him by the booth attendant, glanced at them to see if he had all he wanted for the offices named on the outside, and then, without looking inside, presented them at the polling place, saw that the election inspector dropped each in the right ballot box, and then left.

So much careless voting is declared to have been done in this way that the local party leaders in their deals with one another frequently stole a march on the careless voter by printing on the outside of one party's ballot the name of the office in the same kind of type used by the other party. It was found that it was this sort of work which had resulted in Havemeyer's getting but four votes. But it further developed that of these four votes, two went to him by mistake, two of the voters stating that they had not intended to vote for him but for O'Brien, but their ballots must have had Havemeyer's name on the inside.

Another reminiscence at the dinner was that of a newspaper man of thirty-five years ago, who so manipulated affairs that he got a commissionership. In those days the Mayor's appointments had to be confirmed by the Aldermen. The Mayor had made several appointments for this particular place, but the Aldermen had promptly rejected every one of them, although the position was not of political importance or power. The newspaper man was somewhat of a political worker in his district and thought he saw a chance to make his friends feel that he was somebody. So he went to the Mayor, who liked him as a reporter of events in which he, the Mayor, figured frequently, and asked for the appointment merely as an "empty honor."

"The Aldermen will put your head in the basket with the others," said the Mayor. "But what of that?" replied the newspaper man. "I'll have been nominated all the same and that's something."

Days passed and the Mayor made no nomination. Meanwhile the newspaper man was doing important work for himself among the Aldermen. "Why, I don't want the place particularly," he told them individually, "and if I should be confirmed it would be easy for me then to decline it, and you and the Mayor could keep up the fight as if I hadn't been ever heard of."

Finally the Mayor appointed the journalist. To the Chief Executive's astonishment the nomination was confirmed. The Aldermen, hearing that the Mayor had another man in his mind who would be more objectionable to them than any he had sent in before the newspaper man's name went before them, told the latter to "stand pat"—not to decline the appointment. Of course he accepted it, and it is recorded that he filled out his term of office to the satisfaction of the Mayor and everybody else.

ALTMAN COLLECTION AT MUSEUM OPENS WEDNESDAY

Art at Home and Abroad: News and Comment

THE Metropolitan Museum has taken on a new and stimulating aspect with the installation of the Altman collection in five galleries that will be opened to the public on the 18th of this month. The public, prone to pass with more or less reserve among such works of art as appeal poignantly to the deeply initiated mind, will wander about these rooms with unconstrained enjoyment, yet the art with which they are filled is on the higher levels of technical accomplishment. The paintings in particular will have something to say to all who come, something not literary necessarily or anecdotal, but concerned with life and with human character. This characteristic taken in connection with their clear beauty of execution means, of course, that in the fullest sense of the words they are great art.

In what already has been written of the Altman collection, and of such writing the columns would run to pages and the pages to volumes, stress consistently has been laid upon the extraordinary quality of the various examples and of the collection in mass. Those who know little or nothing of quality have echoed the true connoisseurs and experts, and over the whole country the fame of Mr. Altman's exacting judgment has been spread. This fastidious insistence upon quality is so important to America in the present stage of her development that too much cannot be said in praise of a collection based upon artistic merit. It is not, however, necessary to ignore the fact that together with this high technical standard is found a predilection for humanly interesting works, pictures that find their response in the minds of the least erudite by virtue of their reality, their profoundly sympathetic statement of character, their sincerity and freedom from artfulness.

The Dutch School.

Consider the Rembrandts, generally named as the "feature" of the collection. Here is the famous old woman who cuts her finger nails. The homeliness of the subject extends to the treatment. The artist shows us merely a tidy dame, well clad, with dignity in her strongly molded features. She has the same naturalness that Nicholas Maes was able to obtain in his early pictures of old women reading or knitting or sitting at table with their cats. Rembrandt's loftier genius asserts itself in his uncompromising elimination of insignificant detail, in the breadth with which he treats such detail as he retains, and in his concentration of interest on the intelligent face and expressive gesture. The occupation is an incident. It serves very well to show the rugged loveliness of the old hands still capable and steady, but you think very little of the incident in looking at the picture. You hardly think even of the old woman with her furrowed cheeks on which gray shadows rest. It is the general significance that impresses itself, the strength and beauty of old age before it has fallen upon incapacity.

Here also are Titus, the painter's son, and "The Lady with a Pink," both people of flesh and blood who might yesterday have walked and talked with you. Here is Hendrickje Stoffels overflowing with energy. "Pilate Washing His Hands" contains one of Rembrandt's rare and lovely versions of childhood in the boy who holds the basin and ewer. "The Toilet of Bathsheba After the Bath" shows once more the insignificance of the incident in a great painting. It is of no importance that one serving woman is caring for Bathsheba's feet and another for her hair as she sits among her draperies. Nor is it of importance that the painter has used his rich imagination to create the environment and detail. The important matter is the vitality of the fair, sound flesh and the centring of the spectator's interest on the glowing figure, the perfect artistic unity between the vague, airy background and the central scene, the straightforward rendering of the intimate episode, which curiously keeps its intimacy despite the view of the buildings and distant town, inert and mysterious, throwing into relief the vivid group of women, and the public aspect of the tiring place. There is the sensation of life itself in the painting of this solid little figure robed in light, and most of us are so constituted that when a painting conveys to us the sense of that pulsing life in which for our term of years we share, we are conscious of a feeling of adventure, of extension of opportunity.

In the room with the thirteen Rembrandts are the other pictures of the Seventeenth Century Dutch School. There are three by Frans Hals, so fresh and exultant in handling, so lively in conception, so plastic and pictorial, that no one who is able to come to them in simplicity of mind, without preconceptions of the way such things have been painted by other masters, can fail to feel their force and their buoyancy. Here again is life, and life as we all crave it in our hearts, the plenitude of physical power, the high spirit, the quick response of the muscles to the will.

"Yonker Ramp and His Sweetheart," by Frans Hals.
(In the Altman Collection.)

However far one may get from the habits and tendencies of the romping world portrayed by Hals, its mobility and animation, its jovial self-confidence, especially its healthy freedom from sentimentality, stir the mind and accelerate the pulse. Once more we realize how little the incident counts. The "merry companies" frequented by the painter were often bibulous far beyond the limits set by modern taste, but he is not so much concerned to record the customs of his time as to communicate the cheerful mood of these people. If Rembrandt plunges us into sympathetic retrospection, or at least into contemplation of poetic and general truths, Hals blows away all vapors of the spirit and tells us that mere living is excellent and fit to enjoy. His topers and his laughing cavaliers alike find their account in the pleasure of living. The crowds that presently will pause before his pictures in the Altman collection will find nothing cryptic in his meaning. There is nothing to be explained in the work of so competent an artist except the fact that he knew how to paint—that he knew amazingly how to do the thing he wanted to do.

The trio, Nicholas Maes, Pieter de Hooch, and Jan Vermeer of Delft, are together in this room, companioning their masters. Why are these the "Little Masters" and the others the great masters? Just for this reason: The thing they say is not quite so important to them as the way they say it. When Rembrandt wishes to tell us that the light on a young body wraps it in glory, nothing in the world is allowed to interfere with that point that he has in mind to make. Nothing delays his communication of it. Nothing delays the statement of Hals that every one in his picture is intensely and consciously alive and has a sense of physical well-being. But Maes, showing us the most charming of little housework ers peeling apples, lingers over the accessories, polishes his periods. The Dutch interiors painted by de Hooch are pleasantly prosy, they amble along like a good gossip relishing her tale. It is a capital tale, but one is not allowed to rush through it to get at once to the most significant fact. The attention is ever so little dissipated, it is the tale of one who finds the issues of life and death not so different in degree, after all, from the daily affairs of the household. Every one knows how entwined about the stronger growth of our spiritual existence are these most precious daily affairs, hence there is apparent only a slight barrier between these admirable and lovable "Little Masters" and the painters of higher rank. It is hardly perceptible in their technical accomplishment. It is only seen when the reach of their human feeling is measured.

The others in the room are the meticulous Dou, whose care for accuracy reduced his sitters to tears and rage; the fastidious and aristocratic Gerard Terborch, in an exquisite blond, picture then Albert Cuyp, Meindert Hobbema, and Jacob Ruisdael. It was a quaint fancy to associate with these Dutch painters, so mature and homely and radiant with unconcealed feeling, the little French sculptures of the eighteenth century, Houdon's marble "Bather" the central figure, with Clodion and Pigalle and Falconet as chorus chanting the love of ladies and of wine.

In the second gallery are the other paintings, Flemish, Italian, German, and Spanish. In this gallery one turns naturally to the left, as one should not, the catalogue numbers running the other way. The large early canvas by Velasquez is less entreating after leaving the Dutch room than the Memlings.

Flemish Primitives.

The old man's head by Memling that came from Baron von Oppenheim's collection in Cologne is in a Gothic frame with blue in the arched recesses. Seeing it thus creates a sudden realization of how much a frame means to a picture and a sense of wonder that modern artists are so passive in the shackles of commercial framing. Nothing, however, could spoil that good head. If the visitor has a liking for the type he will closely interrogate the detail. Here the story is character and the painter has told it slowly and in the vernacular without personal comment, but with insight and veracity. The mood is a static mood; one knows instinctively that it seldom changes. Consequently, one is entertained, not bored, by such minutiae as these fingernails, cared for, but stubborn as to cuticle and ribbed by the rheumatic tendency that has ever so little distorted the finger joints; those faintly discernible beard bristles that speak of delayed shaving; the puffy sagging of the flesh under the eyes; the wrinkles that spread over the forehead; the moles and the crowsfeet and the red-rimmed lids. With all this dwelling on the surface of the flesh, however, nothing is permitted to diminish the impression of character. The kind brown eyes tell it no more plainly than the wide whimsical mouth. No one feature tells it alone, but the lovely harmony of all makes it visible. The portraits of Thomas Portunari and his wife are in the same vein, dealing with personalities slightly veiled by social training. Even here there are points to lure a detective curiosity. The lady's long fingers have done more work than those of her husband.

To appreciate Memling's technical achievement it is only necessary to turn from these portraits to that of a man in a high cap by Dirk Bouts. There is character here, too, and in plenty, and the pattern made by the narrow head continuing the lines of the cap is very severe and interesting, if not particularly sensitive. But where Memling has carved with a chisel, Bouts has whittled with a knife. Note the high lights in the eyes, how Bouts has put them in casually, little dots of dead white that lie on the surface; then how Memling has let them subtly emerge from the liquid darkness, hardly discernible as touches of the brush.

Memling's large painting, "The Marriage of St. Catherine," is interesting for its history as well as by its treatment, having once belonged to Sir Joshua Reynolds, who certainly never profited by its lesson of direct expression. The composition has the characteristic suavity and purity of the master in his religious pictures, the bland landscape setting harmonizing with the type of saints and angels, their bulging foreheads and downcast eyes contributing to the general effect of childlike innocence and mild sentiment.

The Early Italians.

Escaping with difficulty from the wall of the Memlings, you move toward Italy and find Filippino Lippi showing his struggles between Botticelli's influence toward rhythms of line and his own love of multitudinous decoration. In strong contrast with his unquiet presentation of the familiar theme, "Virgin and Child with St. Joseph and a Child Angel," is Cosimo Tura's portrait of Cosimo d'Este, with its razor-like profile and its uncompromising severity of treatment. The shoulders of the sitter are not very boldly constructed, but the painter has lavished all his power on the head.

A painter finds interesting his method of sending the front plane of the face back by the subtle blue tone brought into the flesh color in contrast with the warm sienna underpainting where the hair meets the cheek and the flicker of this warm color in the cheek's shadow. No modern painter, has built up his planes more exclusively with color, yet the head has the aspect of a line drawing, so firmly is its bounding line set against the flat background.

Passing the amiable Sebastian Mainardi, Botticelli is found with his "Last Communion of St. Jerome," the wattled interior built up after the fashion of the movable stage. This is Botticelli in his freshest mood. There is nothing in the picture of the painter's strangely stimulating languors, nothing of the profound science of curves marking his earlier work, nothing at all that places him aloof from the natural common world. St. Jerome kneels to take the wafer, the officiating and attendant monks are pitiful and quiet. The composition is perfectly balanced, the color glows, a workmanship, except the disproportionate size of the saint's head. It was painted about 1490, after Botticelli had come under the influence of Savonarola and had become devotional in feeling.

Next on this wall comes Verrocchio's "Madonna and Child," with burnished bosses of flesh that tell the story of familiarity with bronze and other metal work, and with a bit of still life, a rose on the balustrade, lovelier than anything in the picture, after this a "Crucifixion" by Fra Angelico, in which the casual visitor will feel at once a deep serenity and sweetness of mood, an avoidance of all that remotely could suggest horror. The tender body is rent, but it hangs nevertheless in peace without contortion of limb or feature. The group gathered about the cross shows no passion of emotion. The landscape smiles. The force of the composition will be apparent to the more initiated, an architectonic arrangement of horizontals and perpendiculars, with one slow curve formed by the disposition of the figures.

"The Madonna and Child with St. Anne," by Albrecht Durer.

From Angelico to Andrea Mantegna involves only a moment's detention to note how the warmth of the Venetian school emerges in Antonello da Messina's "Portrait of a Young Man." Mantegna's "Holy Family" has been so much discussed since its record-breaking sale from the Weber collection that the public will wonder, no doubt, why this dark mild woman with her grave child, attended by the serious figures of Joseph and the Magdalen, should have stirred the auction room to sensational bidding. There were reasons moving to collectors. Authentic examples of Mantegna's work are of the rarest, and two critics oftener opposed than in agreement, Mr. Berenson and Dr. Bode, were in complete accord over the merit of this fifteenth century masterpiece. The picture is, moreover, in exceptionally fine condition. Painted in distemper on canvas, so lightly that the grain of the linen is seen through the pigment everywhere, not a single stroke of modern retouching has blurred its beauty. Finally, it has the most admirable characteristics of the master to whom it is ascribed. He was capable of severity amounting to coldness, but this picture is severe only to the point of a benignant and noble dignity. He was given to detaching his figures from their backgrounds with an almost violent effort toward salience and sculptural effect. In this instance the figures emerge gently and naturally from their surroundings. The color also is of the most enchanting quality, silvered tones relieved by warm red and orange of great intensity. Next Mantegna, with his "Lady of Rank as Saint Bibiano," and the wall of the Germans is reached.

The Wall of the Germans.

Hans Maler of Ulm came to that town from the rich mining town of Schwaz, near Innsbruck, and received his training from Zeitblom, the most immobile of fifteenth century German painters. It is not surprising that Hans von Ulm inherited something of this passive mood. In comparison with the Rembrandt portraits his rendering of the waxen face of Count Ulrich Fugger of Augsburg lacks significance of expression. Nevertheless, the painter's scrupulous fidelity to external facts brings its reward in the character unconsciously revealed. This man in his brown skull cap and black coat, with his high smooth forehead, and his slightly plaintive mouth, is a personality whose psychological traits are written for us as clearly as his physical features. It is an extremely creditable introduction to the Holbeins that follow, the Lady Rich and the Lady Lee, of which so much has been written that one need say nothing more. Near their enameled surfaces hangs the gnarled Dürer with his "Madonna and Child with St. Anne." German sentiment reaches its full in this Teutonic group. The Virgin is hardly more than a child, her hair is neatly braided down her back, and she wears the plain dress, high collar, and protecting ruche appropriate to the little "backfisch" of a simple household. Her expression is charming, precisely the expression of a domestic little girl who loves babies. The child is sleeping and his parted lips reveal two well developed teeth. St. Anne, a part of whose face only is seen through the opening of her complicated headdress, assumes a certain significance of expression not quite in keeping with the complete naturalness of the other figures.

Among these German types hangs Van Orley's "Virgin with the Child and Angels" in the happiest of outdoor domesticity. The figures are placed in an ornate courtyard. "All the delights which the artist could imagine as belonging to a noble country residence are here," says Mr. Burroughs in his handbook to the collection, "the green terrace dotted with wild flowers, on which the figures are placed, is confined by masonry carefully joined with lead and a brick wall coped with stone where peacocks strut. The fountain, which is of bronze, throws a jet of water into a pool at the left. There is a paved court to the palace and beyond is a Gothic wall. Trees are at the left and in the distance is a precipitous hill with two groups of buildings joined by a drawbridge. Two angelic figures appear in the clouds and a hunter with his dog trudges up the hill." The whole effect is that of gayety and absorption in the joys of maternity, and of the peculiarly wholesome sentiment that connects itself in northern countries with pleasures taken in the open air.

The Later Schools.

Coming to the last of the four walls, consciousness of a greater area of canvas in each picture and of a corresponding opening out of the increased design and breadth of execution makes itself felt. We are in the sixteenth century and among artists of a different type of feeling. The first picture on this wall is the portrait of Filippo Archinto by Titian. The seated figure is drawn with respect for its imposing character, a splendid line circumscribes the form. Of the subject Mr. Burroughs says: "He lives in a famous anecdote which is repeated in the catalogue of the John J. Johnson collection. It seems that when Governor of Rome he was called upon to decide who was the father of a certain child. Of the two claimants one was a German and one a Spaniard. Archinto caused food and wine to be brought and bade the child eat and drink. This he did, but would drink only water. Whereupon the archbishop told the German it was no child of his, because, had he German blood in his veins, he would never drink water when wine was within reach." There is nothing in the fleshy, rather commonplace face to deny his relish of such a lame device. The well-known characteristics of Titian's work are in the painting, especially the grays that have the look of the stone in Gothic cathedrals. Next to this portrait is the head of a young man which Dr. Bode recently has published as one of the few indisputable Giorgiones, a poetic and lovely painting. The two Van Dyck's are both paintings of that master's so-called "Italian period," the portrait of the Marchesa Durazzo much the richer in color and also in feeling. Van Dyck was at his best with his Genoese sitters. Something of their sturdy force was communicated to him. His elegance became more sinewy, his delicacy deeper, his finicky temper more robust. This beautiful Genoese lady is mobile of feature and clear-eyed. She is not posing; it was thus that she habitually sat in her rich costume, talking, one knows, with animation.

Valesquez is shown in two pictures, one early, the "Christ and the Pilgrims of Emmaeus," the other the much-discussed "Portrait of Philip IV.," which emerges triumphant from the consultations of the experts. The Gerard David, "Christ Taking Leave of His Mother," small and precious in quality, must be sought in the case with the enamels and rock crystals.

In this second room of pictures are three cases of such objects of art. They include trypticks by Penicard, the famous pieces from the Spitzer collection; including the Sixteenth Century reliquary of verre Eglonise and enameled gold; the Benevenuto Cellini coupe. All these with the rugs and sculptures and the Chinese porcelains must be left for a later notice.

T. R. IN THE WILDERNESS

Colonel Roosevelt Describes His Travels and Adventures Through Unexplored Regions of Brazil

THROUGH THE BRAZILIAN WILDERNESS. By Theodore Roosevelt. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.50.

IT did not need this latest labor from Col. Roosevelt's pen to vindicate his claim as an earnest, intrepid, and in every sense of the word genuine naturalist. As Executive and politician the Colonel has had to encounter criticism; the continuous rightness of his position and the soundness of his judgment have not always been universally accepted as apparent. But in that field in which he takes his holidays he has been able to inspire confidence unreserved; the "River of Doubt" controversy has been the only attempt of any consequence made to discover lack of ground for that confidence, and the indictment went up in very feeble smoke indeed when the actual records were produced.

Col. Roosevelt makes no extreme scientific pretensions. He is first and foremost a naturalist. But he has the attitude toward scientific phenomena that might be possessed by a scientist on a holiday from the laboratory, who for the moment escapes from that passion for classification which renders scientific research both valuable and unintelligible to the layman. Yet with Col. Roosevelt the assumption of such attitude does not mean relaxation of attention and indulgence in flights of fancy. Col. Roosevelt makes few guesses, he is obsessed by no theories; he is blessed with a power for minute and careful observation, and he lets it go at that. When he concludes, he concludes in open-minded recognition of the fact that he may not possess full data for his assumption. Here is an instance in point, tucked away in his account of the trip to the headwaters of the Paraguay:

> It has been contended that the species (the whitetail deer) has spread from South America northward. I do not think so; and the specimen thus obtained furnished a probable refutation of the theory. It was a buck, and had just shed its small antlers. The antlers are, therefore, shed at the same time as in the north, and it appears that they are grown at the same time as in the north. Yet this variety now dwells in the tropics south of the equator, where the Spring and the breeding season for most birds comes at the time of the northern Fall, in September, October, and November.
> That the deer is an intrusive immigrant, and that it has not yet been in South America long enough to change its mating season in accordance with the climate, as the birds—geologically, doubtless, very old residents—have changed their breeding season, is rendered probable by the fact that it conforms so exactly in the time of its antler growth to the universal rule which obtains in the arctogeal realm, where deer of many species abound and where the fossil forms show that they have long existed.

But to emphasize in this direction and to quote passages such as the above is to create a misleading impression of Col. Roosevelt's book. "Through the Brazilian Wilderness" is not a scientific work; it is informal narrative, a chronicle of adventures through unknown country. Many a schoolboy could substitute for that preposterous favorite of childhood, "Swiss Family Robinson," the Colonel's account of the "River of Doubt," with all the hazards which attended that forty-eight-day journey. Here is adventure enough. Here are accounts of days when the thermometer registered 104 degrees Fahrenheit, of days when drenching rains fell; here are descriptions of all manner of difficulties—impossible portages, treacherous rapids, fever, lack of food—all the misfortunes that make the true explorer's life worth talking about. This Rio Duvida, or, as the Brazilian Government has since christened it, the Rio Téodoro, was not very lenient with the intrepid little party of men who attempted to put it on the map. It "canyons," as we say in the West. It rushes between steep cliffs, where portage along the banks is impossible and where destruction in the swift rapids is almost a certainty. Rivers such as these have snuffed out the life of more than one exploring party; in 1889 the Col. Telles Peres expedition lost all but one officer and two men in the attempt to descend one of the unknown tributaries of the Amazon; it is but recently that André lost two-thirds of his party while exploring Guiana.

The Roosevelt-Rondon party suffered, though it survived. It takes a little from the fine flavor of romance to be assured that the most extreme dangers of the wilderness, as far as animate life is concerned, are to be feared not in snakes or jaguars but in ants and gnats. Yet the perils of these fairly insignificant creatures seem to have been impressed upon the memory of every South American explorer. There are many different kinds of mosquitos, many of them bearers of disease; there are gnats which leave loathsome sores as the result of their sting; there are ants which devour shoe leather and heavy helmets. Col. Roosevelt seems to have had bad luck with his clothing, by the way; once, in the night, a cow came and chewed his clothes up, and by the end of the journey the insect pests had riddled what remained with holes and reduced them to tatters.

On the whole, it must have been a rather distressful-appearing little band of men who stumbled that afternoon of April 15 into the rubber plantation, the first sign of human life they had seen for nearly seven weeks. Col. Roosevelt remarks conservatively that "none was in really buoyant health." As a matter of fact, fever had broken out; one of the men had been claimed by the rapids, and the entire party had had an added strain by the murder of another of the men. The Colonel himself had wrenched his leg badly, inflammation had set in. Four of the canoes had been lost, from time to time baggage had been pitched overboard; the camaradas were thoroughly disheartened, the entire party had been living on half rations for some weeks.

Yet through all this Col. Roosevelt had found opportunity for some amazing diversions, following the trail of some curious bird, picking orchids, or reading a bit. For instance:

> My own books seemed a trifle heavy, and perhaps I would have found the day tedious if Kermit had not lent me the Oxford Book of French Verse. Eustache Deschamp, Joachim du Bellay, the delightful La Fontaine, the delightful but appalling Villon, Victor Hugo's "Guitare," Mme. Desbordes-Valmore's lines on the little girl and her pillow, as dear little verses about a child as ever were written—these and many others comforted me much, as I read them in head net and gauntlets, sitting on a log by an unknown river in the Amazonian forest.

These personal touches enliven the account much, and are wholly suitable to the informal style which the author has adopted. While there is included in the volume an exact account of this river concerning which there has been much question, and painstaking description, with maps and charts, there is also a vast amount of running comment on a number of things which have nothing to do with the Rio Téodoro or natural history, but which give to the reader a pleasant sense of intimacy with the Colonel's trip. And occasionally there are sudden passages which reveal a love of birds and sky and woods in June, and a quick power of its expression, interpolated curiously in a rather brusque style. For example:

> The little white-throated sparrows came familiarly about the palm cabins and white-washed houses and trilled on the rooftrees. It was a simple song, with just a hint of our northern whitethroat's sweet and plaintive melody and of the opening bars of our song sparrow's pleasant, homely lay.
> It brought back memories of glorious April mornings on Long Island, when through the singing of robin and song sparrow comes the piercing cadence of the meadow lark; and of the far northland woods in June, fragrant with the breath of pine and balsam fir, where sweetheart sparrows sing from wet spruce thickets and rapid brooks rush under the drenched and swaying alder boughs.

Then Col. Roosevelt goes right on to say:

> From Tapiropoan our course lay northward up to and across the Plan Alto. * * *

Summing up the Roosevelt-Rondon expedition from the data offered in the Colonel's account, the results are not slight. Over 2,500 birds were collected, about 500 mammals, some reptiles, batrachians, and fishes—many of these new to science, for the regions traversed had never been worked by the scientific collector. In addition, a river some 1,500 kilometers in length, whose upper course was known to no one, was put on the map. And, lastly, Col. Roosevelt has been able to add one more excellent volume to a list which is already a praiseworthy record.

HOW does the war look to the man in the trenches? That is the question which the man in the trenches answers in "In the Firing Line," chiefly composed of extracts from letters written home—many of them, to their mothers—by British privates. Here is a real book of the war. In language always of the simplest, in language at times so artless and so terrible that the phrases of many a lettered mind would seem paltry in comparison, these plain men tell of the battle of Mons, of the long retreat to the shadow of the walls of Paris, and of miscellaneous fighting.

The milkman's helper and the village constable and the hostler—to name three of the occupations represented—are not finding it "very pleasant" to see their "comrades' heads blown off," though at times they find killing the German masses to be "like shooting rabbits." One chapter is composed of extracts from letters written by sailors descriptive of the battle in the North Sea.

The letters are from Scotch and Irish, English and Welsh. Most of the men had not seen service before. Some fought the Boers: these say South Africa in comparison was "child's play" and "a picnic"; "Spion Kop was Heaven," remarks one. A number of letters are from wounded. In almost every instance the chief desire is to get well enough to return to the trenches. "I got away with my left hand split and three fingers blown to pieces. I had two bullets taken from my body on Tuesday, and I tell you I am in pain," remarks one of the Ninth Lancers, as he goes on to hope for recovery that he may fight again.

Regarding the letters as a whole, it is found that certain points are made again and again, that some features have impressed many minds. Striking an average, it may be set down, as far as the testimony of these letters is concerned, that:

1. Horror is the main characteristic of this war to the soldier; no one who has not been on the firing line in France or Belgium can picture, indeed can scarcely credit, the appalling sights of dead and wounded, the sounds of dying: "I cannot mention that place (Cambrai) and close my eyes," writes a Gordon Highlander; the wish is repeatedly recorded, "I hope I may never see such a sight again"; this far is far worse than recruits thought it would be; war is simply vivisection by wholesale without anaesthesia at the time of operating.

Modern Drama That Is Read and Acted

ROMANCE. By Edward Sheldon. New York: The Macmillan Company. $1.25.
MARY JANE'S PA. By Edith Ellis. Vol. XII. in the Modern Drama Series. New York: Mitchell Kennerley. $1.
VAN ZORN. By Edwin Arlington Robinson. New York: The Macmillan Company. $1.25.
THE LITTLE KING. By Witter Bynner. New York: Mitchell Kennerley. 50 cents.

THE only shadow that dims the welcome to the book shelves of "Romance" is the regret that it was not ready in some reading edition when that extremely interesting play by Edward Sheldon was first produced in this city, now more than eighteen months ago. It should have been on sale in the lobby of Maxine Elliott's when the first posters of "Romance" were bedecking the boards and barrels of the five boroughs.

In the lobby of the Kingsway Theatre in Great Queen Street, London, a playhouse distinguished by the tenancy of Granville Barker, there is a little book stand where any evening you may buy for a shilling or thereabouts, not only a trim paper-bound copy of the play occupying the house at the moment, but nearly all the published plays by contemporary authors. This is an established institution, and more than one confirmed playgoer from the States has looked at it covetously as if half minded to carry it off bodily in a taxi. It may be interesting to know that this book stand takes in enough shillings to pay the expense of its maintenance, and Mr. Barker keeps it there because he knows that the producer who seeks to appeal to intelligence will find the course easier as the theatregoers of his community develop the habit—for habit it is—of reading plays.

Mr. Sheldon is an American playwright who has done fine things and from whom big things are expected. He is distinctly one whose manuscripts deserve publication, and it is good to see "Romance" take its place in the library beside "The Nigger." In this play, by means of an unusual construction, he has set within an enhancing, revealing and deftly interpretative frame a story that is of this century in its workmanship, but whose chords and philosophy are of the generation that produced Sardou and Dumas the Younger. It is a play marked not only by Mr. Sheldon's bold disposition to experiment, but by his fine imagination and his graceful utterance.

"Romance" reads well. Perhaps it is the echo in the memory of Doris Keane's own inflections that makes at once so simple and so suggestive the printed words used to indicate the fractured English of Mme. Cavallini. The published play, by the way, is dedicated to "D. K.," presumably Miss Keane, to whom Mr. Sheldon owes much, but certainly not more than she owes him.

The selection of "Mary Jane's Pa" by Edith Ellis as the twelfth volume of the Modern Drama Series is at once a curious and a pleasing one. It is the recognition of substantial value in a comedy that was most entertaining in its performance by Henry E. Dixey and which has the specific virtue of a flavor which, while as unmistakably American as "Queed's," for instance, is produced as independently of local tags or types. It possesses, too, the evidence of a robustly charming fancy in the conception of Hiram Perkins, Nabal—the Indiana species of Paragot who comes back in the end to Mary Jane.

The introduction, which is shyly without signature, is not an illuminating comment on the play, and it bears marks of straining to ascribe to "Mary Jane's Pa" an importance of which that unpretentious work of the theatre is quite innocent. Some notion of the strain can be gathered from such a strangely excessive comment as this:

> Hiram is a scamp in many ways, but he is one of the most lovable scamps created by means of the English tongue since the days of the immortal Falstaff. Without carrying the comparison too far, one might well speak of him as the American Peer Gynt.

Surely the press agent of "Mary Jane's Pa" on its arrival in town could hardly say more without fear of being struck dead at his task.

Both of these plays have been produced. This is not true, as far as memory and the title page serve to indicate, of "Van Zorn," a comedy in three acts by Edwin Arlington Robinson. From this play as a sample, it is to be noted with regret that so interesting a poet as Mr. Robinson should in the dramatic form be so halting in his utterance. His play is tantalizing. It has all the puckered brow and portentous manner of hidden meaning—but the meaning remains hidden even after a most attentive and respectful perusal.

There is all the suggestion of an effort at symbolism which may be and doubtless has been defined as the art of revelation by concealment. But it is difficult to finish Mr. Robinson's comedy without reaching the conclusion that the concealment here is due to inarticulateness. To read "Van Zorn" is to experience the baffling sensation of watching a play from the backdrop instead of from the first row in the orchestra. It is rather too bad to have to depend on the snapping of an ivory paper cutter in a character's fingers for a signal that a poignant moment is at hand. What you hear and see you seem to get by chance. At all events, it is not enough. "Van Zorn" lacks substance not because it is trivial, but because—literally—it is not all there.

It is agreeable to turn to "The Little King," a moving one-act play by Witter Bynner. Its text is verse, its story a chapter in the immense volume of romance and pathos which has been built and is still building around the wistful figure of the "lost Dauphin." Here Mr. Bynner visits the little King among his jailers on the day of his unhappy mother's execution and at a moment when the princeling will not suffer a substitute to offer him a means of escape. The material is, of course, rich in its sympathy. Mr. Bynner's treatment is sturdy and appreciative and "The Little King" is vividly dramatic.

Open-Air Politics

Some rather interesting discussions of political, social, and economic problems, including syndicalism and woman suffrage, are contained in a volume entitled "Open-Air Politics." The author of the volume hides behind the pseudonym "Junius Jay," and the publishers say all they know about him is that he is an American "eminent in public life and of more than national fame." The views the author presents appear in the conversations of a number of imaginary persons who are supposed to be assembled for a Summer outing in a camp in the wilderness. (Houghton Mifflin Company. $1.25.)

Book of Small Houses

An illustrated volume entitled "The Book of Small Houses" contains pictures and descriptions of residential edifices that have been erected in various sections of the country at costs running from $1,500 to $10,000. Included in the volume are articles by Elna Harwood Wharton, Charles E. White, Jr., and Mary W. Mount, each of whom has had extensive experience in house planning. (Macmillan Company. 50 cents.)

GREATER BRITAIN

Prof. Arthur L. Cross's Comprehensive History of England

A HISTORY OF ENGLAND AND GREATER BRITAIN. By Arthur Lyon Cross, Ph. D., Professor of European History in the University of Michigan. New York: The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

THIS lucid history tells the fascinating story of England from the days of ancient Britain down to the Home Rule situation in Ulster in 1914; of the expansion of the domain of the tiny island kingdom of 50,000 square miles to the overlordship of 13,963,000 square miles—about one-fourth of the globe's land surface—and of 423,000,000 persons. The author brings the history up to the very minute, recording the repeal of the exemption clause of the Panama Canal Tolls bill on June 12 last in his discussion of the relations between Great Britain and the United States.

The book is written in a clear, direct style that makes easy reading; the facts are well presented; every chapter is crammed with information, without padding and without the lengthy dissertations and moralizings which are the sin of some historians. In short, it is an admirable volume for any one who wants a straightforward recital, complete yet reasonably brief, of the story of England.

The typographical arrangement is such that topics can be found with ease. Practically every paragraph deals with a separate topic or a separate subdivision of a topic, this topic being summarized in bold face type in a side heading at the beginning of the paragraph. Few paragraphs are over a page in length, while the average is half a page or less.

As Prof. Cross explains in his preface, particular stress has been laid upon those features which should be of peculiar interest to Americans because they touch fundamental American interests, such as the origin and development of the American common law, the causes of the American Revolution, and the growth of British imperialism.

In considering Greater Britain, the author points out that the trade of the British Empire now reaches approximately $8,000,000,000 annually, while its total revenue exceeds $2,000,000,000. With the exception of Canada and parts of India, the greater part of the empire was only acquired or settled during the last century.

To King Edward VII. and the Marquis of Lansdowne the author gives the credit, on the British side, for bringing about the entente cordials with France, later expanded into the Triple Entente, which has had so momentous a part in the present war.

King Edward was particularly attached to France, both imperial and republican. As Prince of Wales he had made long and frequent visits in Paris, where he had many warm friends. In 1903 he went to Paris, during his first Continental tour since reaching the throne. This visit was returned by President Loubet shortly afterward. Prof. Cross explains that these visits prepared the way for the entente cordiale, concluded by Lansdowne and M. Delcassé, then Foreign Minister and now one of the strongest men in the present war cabinet, on April 8, 1904.

Of the terms of this understanding, one of the most important diplomatic arrangements in the history of Europe, Prof. Cross writes:

> The British agreed to recognize French interests in Morocco, while the French agreed to recognize those of Great Britain in Egypt. In return for an assurance that the British Government would not alter the political status of Egypt, they ceased to ask for a fixed time for the withdrawal of the British, and consented to allow them a freer hand in the administration of Egypt's surplus revenues.
> The entente cordials was later expanded into a triple entente by the adhesion of Russia, the ally of France, and served as a counterpoise to the triple alliance of Germany, Austria and Italy.

The author goes on to point out that Edward the Peacemaker could accomplish "very little" toward improving relations with Germany. He says:

> The latter country, (Germany,) in consequence of the enormous development of population and industry following the Franco-Prussian war, sought to spread beyond the seas, and resented the fact that Great Britain had pre-empted the best part of the colonial field. The British, on their part, were apprehensive of the increasing manufacturing and commercial development of Germany, and of her growing sea power.

Prof. Cross finds that the Mexican situation during the last year has "put a severe strain on Anglo-American relations."

Although the suffragettes have not yet attained the goal they seek, they have cause to feel grateful for the condition of women today compared to that of a few decades ago. The author says:

> Although much remains to be done, the lot of women has greatly improved since the beginning of the century. Within the memory of those now living, the education of girls was largely in the hands of governesses and private schools, with the emphasis on deportment, music, and other accomplishments. Memory was trained at the expense of the reasoning faculties, and teaching was given out of "elegant abridgments."
> Since the middle of the century, however, their instruction has approximated that of boys, and higher education has been opened to them. In 1867 women were admitted to examinations at the University of London, in 1881 at Cambridge, and in 1884 at Oxford. Meantime, two colleges for women, Girton and Newnham, had been founded at Cambridge. In 1837 the Ladies' Gallery was opened in the new House of Commons.

and his company mates, for instance seemed like the "big crowd that streamed out of Crystal Palace when we went to see the Cup final—you couldn't miss them"; as fast as fifty or a hundred Germans are shot down, fifty or a hundred more take their places; they come on like "swarms of bees," like "countless thousands of sheep," like "peas from a sack"; the consequent slaughter is prodigious, the British guns mowing them down like "a farmer's machine cutting grass," like "a scythe," the fallen having been seen ten deep for long distances, in "heaps of semi-moving remnants."

3. The German artillery fire is good, the infantry fire is poor. Germans do not like the bayonet; they have killed British wounded, they have been brutal to women and children; they are merciless, they are brave.

4. In the naval battle in the North Sea German officers shot their own men who sought to jump overboard from sinking ships; Germans fired on British boats picking up German wounded; German officers refused rescue and went down standing rigid on the bridge.

One soldier makes the odd comment that it is found that men from the big cities can stand the noise of battle better than those from the country. A Gordon Highlander states that in twenty-four hours' fighting 1,100 of his famous regiment were reduced to five officers and 170 men. A private of the Second South Lancashire tells his wife that he crawled for half a mile over dead.

Throughout the letters can be seen valor and fortitude and patience. The spirit of the British trenches is epitomized by Corp. Sam Haslett in mentioning "a young lad of the West Kents" who had run away from home and lay with a shell wound: "He hadn't long to live, and knew it, but he wasn't at all put out about it." The dying lad said to Haslett: "Mother and dad don't know I'm here, but you tell them I'm not sorry I did it."

Few normal men of British descent will read this book without feeling thrilled that they belong to the same race as these fighters of the great war. Despite the ante-bellum cries of "Decadence," Great Britain still breeds men.

In his book, "Who Is Responsible?" Mr. Brereton declares that Britons must use as their battle cries for this war "A fight to the finish" and "Never again." The nation will not stop the war until Germany is absolutely beaten, and this beating must be so complete that the danger of German militarism will be forever removed from the European horizon.

It is the Prussian tradition, starting with the days of Frederick, which has succeeded in "corrupting the Germany of today," so the author finds. It is found that German diplomacy has so bungled affairs during the past twenty-five years that the empire has not a friend in the world outside Austria and Turkey. As to the internal situation of Germany, the author's studies show that the vast mass of the nation lies "bound in the toils of the most scientific bureaucracy in the world."

Free speech and free criticism are declared to be practically impossible to Germans, and it is stated that investigation shows the intellectual élite of the country to be "little better than an academic garrison at the beck and call of the Government. Even the schools are schools of chauvinism." Mr. Brereton finds that the spiritualism of Germany is buried today "under the weight of Prussian materialism. Germany is a science-ridden State."

It is as a result of these conditions that we have "the monstrous doctrine" that German civilization is not only the best, but that it is Germany's duty to impose it everywhere. Germany is a standing warning, says the author, of a too exclusively man-made civilization, in this connection recalling Bismarck's remark that the German was a male nation. Women must be looked to in the future as one of the great forces making for peace. Mr. Brereton prophesies that if the Allies win "the peace of the world for the next hundred years will largely rest with the women."

Georges Bourdon, editor of the Paris Figaro, made a tour of Germany last year for the purpose of obtaining a first-hand understanding of sentiment in the fatherland toward France and of conveying to Frenchmen that understanding through the Figaro. The results of his tour are contained in "The German Enigma."

M. Bourdon had a most interesting tour, being received by many of the most prominent men in Germany. In addition to talking with men of international fame, he also interviewed representative men in various business fields, manufacturers, bankers, and so forth, his attempt being to strike a general average of intelligent German opinion regarding France. Among the well-known men he talked with were von Kiderlen-Waechter, President of the Reichstag; Prince Lichnowsky, Ambassador to Great Britain when war was declared; Prince Hatzfeldt, former leader of the Conservatives in the Reichstag; Hermann Sjdermann, Gen. Keim, President of the Military League, and Theodor Wolff, editor of the Berliner Tageblatt.

M. Bourdon returned to France somewhat puzzled. Everywhere he found evidences that German militarism is bred in the bone of the nation; at the same time every one whom he interviewed declared that Germany did not want war with any one, and with France least of all nations. The Germans insisted that the difficulty in the way of a rapprochement between Germany and France lay with France, because of the French refusal to forget Alsace-Lorraine. At the same time it was freely admitted by the Germans that their nation was arming to the teeth and constantly increasing the armaments. It was insisted, however, that this was done for purposes of self-defense. The German viewpoint, as obtained by M. Bourdon, is that it is one thing to be militaristic and quite another to be warlike and bellicose.

Dr. von Mach is an American and a graduate of Harvard, although of Prussian birth. His book is a calm, good-tempered attempt to place the German position in a favorable aspect before American eyes, and the book gains strength and assures itself of getting read in a fair-minded spirit by the average man because of its restrained, non-controversial tone.

The author, at the very outset, goes on record as to the writings of Gen. von Bernhardi, who has been so generally accepted in the United States and Great Britain as the spokesman for Germany. Dr. von Mach declares that von Bernhardi's "Germany and the Next War," which has been so widely quoted, "did not voice the popular sentiment of Germany." He asks why von Bernhardi's writing should be accepted as summarizing the German view when those of Homer Lea, "the British von Bernhardi," are not regarded as summarizing the British position.

As to "What Germany Wants," the title of his book, Dr. von Mach catalogues what he understands to be the Fatherland's desires. He says that she wants to keep the confines of her home land inviolate, while not desirous of joining to them new lands of unwilling peoples; she wants to develop her colonies and invest her money in building extra-territorial railways; she wants to develop home commerce and industry; she wants to be worthy of her great past and to make her own contributions to the civilization of the world; she wants social justice, she wants a stable peace, and she wants the good-will of the world. Since her industrial development started "she has never desired war." "Her aggressiveness has been solely commercial."

In taking as the title of his book the German Chancellor's famous characterization of the Belgian neutrality treaty—"A Scrap of Paper"—Dr. Dillon declares that the phrase "is destined to stick like a Nessus' shirt to the memory of its author, his imperial inspirer, and their country until such time as the militarism which originated it has been consumed without residue." The phrase is a "Satanic sneer," and "so such powerful dissolvent of organized society has been devised since men first began to aggregate."

Dr. Dillon finds that Germany has been and is wholly in the wrong, and that it would be hard to imagine a worse case than that with which she is forced to go before the judgment of the world. "Brutal force, in the form of jackboot tyranny," is "the new social gospel of the Hohenzollerns, the last word of Teutonic culture."

There are ideas and facts of interest in each of the Oxford pamphlets. In the first of his pamphlets on the Germans Mr. Fletcher holds that the military morals of today are very much worse than those of our ancestors, pointing out that "in particular the French and English, when they met, always fought each other like gentlemen," and by no means stooped to such methods as have been introduced in this war (so the author charges) by the Germans. In his pamphlet on India, Sir Ernest Trevelyan says that the supply of trained soldiers in India, keen for war, "is practically inexhaustible," and that the expressions of loyalty from all parts of India are the fruit of many years of "honesty and straight dealing" by the British.

In "The Red Cross in War" it is explained that the Boer war marked the passing of the old and coming of the new in military nursing. Besides a comprehensive description of the splendid British Red Cross, the French and Russian Red Cross are dealt with. The French Red Cross is declared admirable, while the Russian organization is stated to be "as perfect as any in the world."

"Forty Years After," besides giving the history of the Franco-Prussian war, draws comparisons between conditions then and now. Incompetent Generals caused the French defeat in 1870. The Germans are stated to be carrying out in 1914 the Bismarck theory of war, the author quoting Bismarck to the effect that a victorious army should leave the inhabitants of the districts which it conquers with "nothing but their eyes to weep from."

SONGS FOR THE NEW AGE

SONGS FOR THE NEW AGE. By James Oppenheim. The Century Company. $1.50.

ONE of the most encouraging things about life and literature is that they are both so everlastingly new. Every poet sings his new songs to a new age, whether he specifically tells us so or not; so Mr. Oppenheim by the title of his new book indicates the entire normality of his poetical "reactions." This is good news about any poet, and is especially welcome with regard to one whose prose work had hardly prepared us for the beauty and dignity of a number of these verses.

Mr. Oppenheim is at times rather impatient with the new age:

> Civilization!
> Everybody kind and gentle, and men giving up their seats in the car for the women . . .
> What an ideal!
> How bracing!

But he finds consolation for its "soft ideals" in the comfortable thought that after all

> This is an excellent age for insurrection, revolt, and the reddest of revolutions.

His own contribution to revolt lies less in the spirit than in the letter of his verse, which is altogether unrhymed and, as the author himself calls it, "polyrhythmical." There will not be lacking undiscerning ones who will see in "Songs for the New Age" merely an echo of Whitman, but this is not just to Mr. Oppenheim. He merely claims the same freedom that Whitman did, and uses it according to the light given him. In spirit the poems are as old as the soul of man, but are given an up-to-date touch which justifies their title by the way in which the soul looks upon itself. For this age is, beyond most that have preceded it, a self-conscious and self-analytical one; we are on terms of almost immoral intimacy with ourselves. And Mr. Oppenheim's poetry is strongly self-conscious, not in any ill sense, but as the natural expression of any soul vitally interested in itself and convinced that the chief object of the solar system has been to provide a suitable cradle for it must be self-conscious. The note of the book is "We." Its sub-titles are "We Dead," "We Living," and "We Unborn." The first group teaches that that failure to express one's individuality strongly and directly, is the only death.

> The real sin is in being divided against yourself; in wanting one thing and doing another;

"We Living" sings "like the shouting of a backstay in a gale," of passion lifted to a plane where the physical and spiritual blend. It includes the best poems of the book. "A Woman for the Adventure" voices with willful and naked egotism the desire of every man for a woman who shall be at once perfect mistress, mother, and boon companion, and goes on to a climax of insatiableness often blindly felt, but that seldom rises to the level of expression:

> Yet demand worst of all: and paradox qualat:
> As I stand father to the children of her body,
> I want the woman who stands father to the children of my spirit:
> Yea, she who comes to her fulfillment through my vision and my works.

In the third part of the book, "We Unborn," the qualities and the defects of Mr. Oppenheim's talent are emphasized, not to say exaggerated. To use a vulgar phrase, he has bitten off more than he can chew, but it must be said that he chews vigorously. Speaking for the hordes whose > * * * thirst is a thirst no liquor can reach nor slake,

> And our hunger a hunger by no bread filled,

he invokes in his final lines, the Cosmic Mother:

> Bear me on thy tides and pour through me into great and unwithheld creations love:
> Let my lips in the darkness bear witness to thee:
> Let my works be thy works through the toil of my hands:
> Let me go forth in the day dawning, dropping the stars of thy heavens on the darkened streets:
> I am thy son, and I would have thee take joy in me:
> I am thy unborn, Mother, moving toward the morn of my nativity.

It is to be hoped that Mr. Oppenheim will write more "We Living" poems. For those of us who are really dead don't know it; and, worse still, don't care, which is the essence, in fact, of being dead, and nothing short of Gabriel's trump will awaken us. And the we unborn, naturally enough, have a certain inarticulateness about us which does not make for artistic effect. But more of the "We Living," passionate and egotistical and human, by all means, Mr. Oppenheim!

FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Art, Adventure, and Fiction for Boys and Girls

HERE is a really interesting book for boys. It is "An American Crusoe," by A. Hyatt Verrill, with excellent text illustration of tropical life and less interesting full-page pictures. (Dodd, Mead & Co., $1.25.) The book is described on the title page as being "A Record of Remarkable Adventures on a Desert Island with Only a Jack Knife." The author of the book in a natural history expedition in the West Indies camped for several weeks upon the little-known island which he has made the site of the adventures of the American Crusoe. He takes exception to the habit of many writers of adventure stories of locating animals and plants which belong to different zones in tropical countries to help their heroes out of difficulties.

Trade Wind Key, the "desert island" which he describes, actually exists and the flora and fauna as he has described them are to be found there. Pirates' forts, buccaneers' ruins, relics of more adventurous days, exist as he has described them. Mr. Verrill was impressed with the possibilities of the place for the adventures of a modern Crusoe and experimented. He actually performed the feats of the hero of his story. Minus the suffering and the treasure finding, the story is a true though voluntary performance. Realism was given when the writer was obliged to subsist for three days on rainwater from pools in the rocks, no other fresh water being obtainable.

A lesson the writer would teach is the necessity of learning to observe nature closely and retaining in the memory of such observations for future need, enabling one in time of trouble to overcome difficulties and mitigate discomforts. The author regrets that it is not in his power to "transport a shipload of adventure-loving American boys to this island-gem and there turn them loose to ramble over the ruins, explore the dense tropical forests, penetrate the caves, and search for hidden treasure in the old underground vaults." The boys would be only too glad to go.

A solid and interesting book of 687 pages is "The Story of Our Army for Young Americans," by Willis J. Abbot, with illustrations from old prints and photographs. (Dodd, Mead & Co., $2.) It is a history of the defenders of the country from Colonial days and the Revolutionary War to the present time of peace. It is well written and the grown-up boys who know more about the subject matter will also find it interesting. "In the Trenches on San Juan Hill" is one of the later pictures, and the cover shows a line of men firing from the deep grass. Pictures showing the devastations of these wars are tame now compared to those of the great European conflict which is making history daily.

Worth while are "Stories from Wagner," by J. Walker McSpaden, with illustrations in color, (Crowell, $1.50.) "Stories from Robert Browning," by V. Cameron Turnbull, with soft-toned illustrations in color, are preceded by a sketch of Browning as a man and poet. The interest of the stories the writer hopes will lead the young people to an immediate and close acquaintance with the poems. The sympathetic introduction will help them to do so.

A nice, square, thick volume is "The Book of Friendly Giants," by Eunice Fuller, with delightful pictures, text, and full-page, in black and white, by Pamela Colman Smith, and introductory verses by Seymour Barnard. It seems that giants should be as amiable as they are big, and it is necessary to read this book and its pictures to know all one should about these interesting big people.

A big book in big type with many pictures is "The Topsy-Turvy Fairy Book," by Anna Alice Chapin, with a gay-colored cover. (Dodd, Mead & Co.) A very nice story, indeed, is "Lady Rumdidoodledum's Children," much better than its name, by S. B. Dinkelspell, one of the "Mother Dear" books. (Desmond Fitzgerald, $1.) It is made up of stories told by "Flip," little Lisa's name for Philip, to Mother Dear's children, Martha Mary, Edward Lee, and the others—stories which grow together into one big story. "Wild Kindred of Fur, Feather, and Fin" is the name of a book by Jean M. Thompson, which tells its own stories of animals, birds, and fish. (W. A. Wilde Company, $1.25.) Several short stories in a small, thin book are to be found in "The Animal School," by Frances Weld, with gay-colored pictures by Clara E. Atwood. (The Pilgrim Press, 50 cents.)

"Little Buffalo Robe" is a long story of a little Indian girl who is lost, and her adventures, which she tells in the Indian way, and of the things she sees and thinks. Ruth Everett Beck, the author, is the wife of an army officer and knows the Indians and the imagery of their thoughts. The illustrations are by Indians, Angel De Cora and Lone Star, of the Art Department of the Carlisle Indian School. (Henry Holt & Co. $1.35.) "Good Stories for Great Holidays," by Frances Jenkins Olcott, (Houghton Mifflin Company, $2.) is a book thought out and arranged with much care. It contains 120 stories for seventeen holidays. It is not only intended that they shall be read by the children and used for reading aloud, but for story-telling, which the compiler believes is a worthy holiday pastime, developing the holiday spirit. Many authors and many countries have been drawn upon for the stories, and myths and fables have been used. All the familiar holidays of the year and many of which people seldom think have been given their stories. At the end of the book are reference lists for story-telling and collateral reading, a subject index and indexes of authors and titles.

In six little books in gay-colored board covers are as many tales from Mother Goose, enlarged into real stories by Carolyn Wells. (Dodd, Mead & Co.) The six books put together like a puzzle in a large flat box make a picture of Mother Goose flying over a town. The title of each story begins with the word "little." "Little Miss Muffet," "Little Jack Horner," "Little Polly Flinders," and all the rest. The text is printed in brown and so are the nice little pictures.

A big beautiful thick book, much broader than it is high—why do they make them that shape when they are so much harder to handle?—is "The Jessie Willcox Smith Mother Goose." (Dodd, Mead & Co., $2.50.) The illustrations, black and white in the text and full page in colors, are very charming, as they cannot fail to be by this artist, particularly the first one of the "baby in the tree top." A real mother goose and her little white goslings adorns the inside cover pages. There is an interesting historical note preceding the rhymes.

"Patty's Suitors" is another of the Patty books by Carolyn Wells. (Dodd, Mead & Co., $1.25.) In the end Patty finds that she has been jealous of a horse, "Kitty," which she thinks is a girl. There are nice little love stories in "Susan Grows Up," by Mary F. Leonard. (Crowell, $1.50.) Published by Crowell are "The Boys of East Marsh," two groups of boys from preparatory schools on the New England coast, by Fisher Ames, Jr., and "In the Path of La Salle," by Percy K. Fitzhugh, a lively Boy Scout story, with many adventures and amusing experiences with moving-picture men. (Each $1.25.) A Western story is "Scarface Ranch; or, The Young Homesteaders," by Edwin L. Sabin. ($1.50.) Exciting adventures are to be found in an English tale, "Sons of the Sea," a Sea-Scouting Story," by Christopher Beck. (Lippincott. $1.) "Left End Edwards" is Steve Edwards in one of the good football stories Ralph Henry Barbour knows how to write. (Dodd, Mead & Co., $1.25.)

"Tales of Old New York, the Indian and Dutch Periods" is a small history for children, by Albert Ulmann and Grace C. Strachan, with many illustrations. (Appleton & Co.) "The Rejuvenation of Father Christmas," by J. Edgar Park, is something all the world is aiming at. (The Pilgrim Press, 50 cents.) Father Christmas has grown old, it seems, because he has lost the beautiful, youth-giving thought of love and good-will which was at first back of his kindly distribution of gifts. Now as he prays for a change of heart, he says: "I fear, O Lord, I've turned my birthday into a great commercial exchange and the song of the angels into the smug notice: 'Shop Early.'" Two books brought out by the Catholic press of Benziger Brothers are "Shipmates," by Mary T. Waggaman, and "Five Birds in a Nest," by Henriette Eugene Delamare. (Sixty cents each.)

BOOKS ON ART

Its Various Phases by Kadinsky and Others

THE ART OF SPIRITUAL HARMONY. By Wassily Kandinsky. Translated with an introduction by M. T. H. Sadler. Boston and New York: Houghton Mifflin Company. 1914. Price, $1.75 net.

ART. By Clive Bell. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Company. Price, $1.25.

ART TALKS WITH RANGER. By Haley Husted Bell. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1914.

ETCHING. By George T. Plowman. New York: John Lane Company. 1914. Price, $1.50.

MANY books are written about paintings, sculptures, buildings, pottery, woodwork, museums, fountains, formal gardens, &c. Almost no books are written about art. It is interesting therefore to find in the list of recent works two at least that come clearly under the more general classification. The first, taking them in order of importance, is Kandinsky's "The Art of Spiritual Harmony," the translator's equivalent for "Uber das Geistige in der Kunst," the work in which Kandinsky, leader of the new art movement in Munich, cheerily attempts to write down his philosophy. Whether he succeeds or not must be left to the judgment of philosophers. He does, however, make perfectly clear to even the most casual reader what every artist of the slightest importance knows—that art is not nature or imitation of nature, that it is constructive and springs from an inner necessity for expression. He goes farther than most artists in declaring that in a work of art "the more obvious the separation from nature, the more likely is the inner meaning to be pure and unhampered." This is the essence of Kandinsky's singularity. He is so much impressed by the freedom of art from any obligatory subordination to or connection with nature that he has attempted to work out a method by which painting can get spiritual values into the mind of the observer without leaning upon the element of representation. This is what he says:

> A painter who finds no satisfaction in mere representation, however artistic, in his longing to express his inner life, cannot but envy the ease with which music, the most non-materiid of the arts today, achieves its ends. He naturally seeks to apply the methods of music to his own art. And from this results that modern desire for rhythm in painting, for mathematical abstract construction, for repeated notes of color, for setting color in motion.

He adds, and those who have thought of him as an unbalanced "modernist" should note the sanity of his contention:

> This borrowing of method by one art from another can only be truly successful when the application of borrowed methods is not superficial, but fundamental. One art must learn first how another uses its methods, so that the method may afterward be applied to the borrower's art from the beginning, and suitably. The artist must not forget that in him lies the power of true application of every method, but that that power must be developed.

Filled with the picturesque correspondences that spring promptly to an artist's mind, verbose but in no manner outrageous or even eccentric, the book is one to be read quite simply, as one might read the letters of one musician to another, getting intuitively at the thought back of occasional technical phrases. That is the way the author would like to have us approach his pictures also, which is not so easy.

Mr. Sadler, in his preface, makes it somewhat easier by drawing an interesting parallel between the art of Kandinsky and that of Picasso. He says that Kandinsky is "painting music." That is, he has broken down the barrier between painting and music, has isolated the pure emotion that we call "artistic emotion," and has succeeded in producing upon some minds, at least, by means of lines and colors in combinations independent of representation, the same effect as harmony and rhythm in music produce upon persons who are truly musical. Picasso's admirers also call him a "visual musician." But Picasso attempts to carry water on both shoulders, and endeavors to harmonize certain items of reality, a number, a button, a few capital letters, with a surrounding aura of angular projections. It is something like imitating a dog's bark or the breaking of a plate in sound, and then proceeding from this realistic representation to the abstract forms of music. In other words, he is trying to make the best of two worlds, while Kandinsky is content with searching out the logical analogy between color and sound, between line and rhythm.

The second book to be dedicated to pure art is by a critic, Clive Bell, and indicates how far the educated modern critic has come toward apprehending the artist's passion for significant form. He has passed far by that stupid stumbling block of the subject in art. He has passed that question of likeness. He has arrived at an artistic standpoint. Of representation he says: "Let no one imagine that representation is bad in itself; a realistic form may be as significant in its place as part of the design, as an abstract. But if a representative form has value it is as form, not as representation. The representative element in a work of art may or may not be harmful; always it is irrelevant. For to appreciate a work of art we need bring with us nothing from life, no knowledge of its ideas and affairs, no familiarity with its emotions. Art transports us from the world of man's activity to a world of aesthetic exaltation. For a moment we are shut off from human interests, our anticipations and memories are arrested; we are lifted above the stream of life. The pure mathematician rapt in his studies knows a state of mind which I take to be similar if not identical. He feels an emotion for his speculations which arises from no perceived relation between them and the lives of men, but springs, inhuman or superhuman, from the heart of an abstract science."

So far Mr. Bell is on secure ground. When he comes to particular instances most of his readers will gasp. It is not improbable that he meant his statements to produce that effect. He divides historic art into slopes, and by a slope he says he means that which lies between a great primitive morning, when men create art because they must, and that darkest hour when men confounded imitation with art. Giotto stands on one peak from which we slip downward toward the Classical Renaissance in which flounder Correggio and Michelangelo. He writes:

> The sixteenth century produced a race of artists peculiar in their feeling for material beauty, but normal, coming as they do at the foot of the hills; in their technical proficiency and aesthetic indigence. Craft holds the candle that betrays the bareness of the cupboard. The significance of form is feeble and impurely felt, the power of creating it is lost almost, but finer descriptions have rarely been painted.

It is in this insensitiveness to art of a kind that does not reveal its significance by means of the formulas he has learned that Mr. Bell shows his lack of the deep insight often called tolerance which marks the highest order of mind. The arch rebel Kandinsky is more at one with Michelangelo than Mr. Bell.

When an artist of experience talks he is apt to say something. He is like a business man, opposed to sentimentality and sure of his own mind on the subjects that interest him. The public no longer expects poetic vagaries from painters and sculptors, and has, in fact, developed an unusual liking for their spoken word. These talks with Mr. Ranger, which his interviewer secured with the avowed intention of using them for publication, probably suffer somewhat from the painter's knowledge that he was talking for print, miss somewhat the casual ease of unhampered intercourse. Nevertheless they contain much interesting material, some of it drawn from personal experience in meeting technical problems, some of it reminiscence and anecdote, and the last, no doubt, will make the most direct appeal to the general public.

In the chapter on the restoration of pictures Mr. Ranger is not happy about museum methods. "Museums," he says, "seem to have a knack of doing the wrong thing," and he points to Turner's "Slave Ship," which he once knew as a "sumptuous and rather lurid piece of color," and which is now "an incongruity which sets your teeth on edge," owing to unskilful removal of the varnish; to the two Rembrandts, "Dr. Tulp and His Wife," in the Boston Museum, and to various pictures in the Metropolitan Museum which have been spoiled for him by restorers. He then turns to the backgrounds against which museum pictures are hung and finds them cheerless. On the occasion of the Whistler exhibition at the Metropolitan Museum in 1910, with the walls covered with cheesecloth, he found the dark pictures looking far heavier and darker than they really were owing to this strong contrast, the beautiful "Bognor" being almost unrecognizable, and when Mr. Frick's Rembrandts were shown at the Hudson-Fulton exhibition the gray walls spoiled for him the grays in the pictures that "flickered and trembled through the golden tones enveloping them" when they hung on the walls of their owner's house.

As an artist he keeps to the old close union between art and nature, which the public find easier to understand than Mr. Kandinsky's independent attitude. Browning was quite sure that art was given to make us love > things we have passed

> Perhaps a hundred times nor cared to see.

For Browning and Landor and Mr. Ranger art is still the handmaid of nature.

Mr. Plowman in his book on etching and other graphic arts confines himself to a narrower field and discusses chiefly technical methods with a thoroughness that will make many of the pages interesting to even the expert etcher. The author stresses the fact, however, that technical facility is of no avail if one is not first an artist, and for the benefit of the careless beginner insists upon the necessity of constant and severe drill in drawing before etching is attempted. The second part of the volume is given up to descriptions of materials, recipes for acid baths and preparations for the plate, hints for printing, &c. Interest in the graphic arts is increasing so rapidly in this country and practical works of this kind are so few that the book should meet with an enthusiastic welcome.

THE CALL OF THE STARS

THE CALL OF THE STARS. By John R. Kippax. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

While far from being elementary in the usual sense of the word, Mr. Kippax has written with such simplicity and clearness that his book may truly be called a "Star and Planet Book for the People." He assures his readers that for the amateur star gazer particular interest will attach to perhaps not over 300 easily identified stars, and then furnishes, by way of introduction, an account of the night skies of Spring, Summer, Autumn, and Winter. Many interesting facts are given about the earth and her great day and night illuminators, while each of the planets is excellently described.

Throughout the book extracts from ancient mythology are largely used, while numerous quotations from both ancient and modern poets together with numbers of excellent photographs and up-to-date charts and diagrams help the reader to a closer knowledge of his subject.

THE PAN-ANGLES

A Federation of All English-Speaking Whites

THE PAN-ANGLES: A Consideration of the Federation of the Seven English-Speaking Nations. By Sinclair Kennedy. With a map. Longmans, Green & Co. $1.75.

THE federation of the one hundred and forty-odd millions of English-speaking whites scattered in all quarters of the globe is the subject of an elaborate "consideration" by Sinclair Kennedy. He regards it as the best, practically as the only, way in which this vast body of whites can retain the power they now have or maintain the standard of living which they have reached. What they have they possess because they wanted it and were strong enough to take it and have been, as yet, strong enough to hold it. This hold, however, is menaced in various directions, particularly and most nearly by Russia, more remotely by Japan, still more remotely by the Chinese. Fully to be prepared to meet the menaces that may thus arise, the author thinks that the co-operation of Germany with the English-speaking whites should be secured and would be, if not indispensable, extremely desirable.

While Mr. Sinclair Kennedy was toiling steadily in the compilation of the great mass of facts on which he bases his conclusions, Germany made war on Russia and on her ally, France; England took arms against Germany and summoned Japan to her aid in the Orient. Whatever else may come out of this vast convulsion, it is impossible that the main elements in the problem Mr. Kennedy studies so confidently shall ever again present themselves in the form that he sees them. It may come about that the United States and the six nations embraced in Great Britain may form a federal union to care for their common interests; but obviously it will not be in unison with Germany or in hostility to Russia or Japan. And we venture to think that any such federation as ultimately may be evolved will have a broader, better basis than the mere taking and keeping everything within reach.

Mr. Kennedy's thesis is a plausible one, and it is worked out with great patience and in a very candid spirit. But the underlying assumption is, we believe, radically mistaken, as well as essentially brutal. It is, in substance, the assumption that the gain of one people must be a loss to another, in war, in expansion, and in trade. Even in war the assumption does not necessarily hold, and in expansion and trade it need not hold at all. The net outcome of the Boer war was not a loss for the Boers. That of the long series of wars in India was not a loss for the defeated tribes. The expansion of British rule and commerce since free trade was adopted has not been at the expense of other peoples. And when the present world conflict comes to an end it may very well be that the old belief in force as the sole basis of national strength and prosperity may largely be abandoned and the principle of federation be substituted for the arbitrament of arms. Mr. Kennedy's exposition of what federation might do for the English-speaking white nations has a peculiar interest in connection with this possibility.

GOLFING PHILOSOPHY

THE HAPPY GOLFER: Being Some Experiences, Reflections and a Few Deductions of a Wandering Player. By Henry Leach. Macmillan Co. $1.75.

Mr. Leach is himself the happiest of happy golfers, a veteran player who stands as a formidable disproof of the theory that golf begets neurasthenia. In his frequent visits to this country as golfing correspondent of The London Times, or other English newspapers, he has impressed the golfers he has met not only as a competent judge of play, but as an unprejudiced one, who has made it his business to inform the British public as to the progress of the ancient game in America. It is one of Mr. Leach's pleasant theories that golf is a game of universal interest, that "it seizes men of all ages, every nationality, all occupations, dispositions, and temperaments." We are not inclined to find any personal application in his remark that "savages have attempted golf and found they liked it." He is sure that the feelings induced by golf are "subtler and sweeter" than those inspired by any other game or sport.

The "physical delight that is gained by the driving of a golf ball with a wooden club in the manner that it ought to be driven" has been a part of his experience; while he likens the joys of the "short game" well played to listening to Mendelssohn after Beethoven. Various chapters in this book treat of recent golfing incidents in this country, including Ouimet's memorable defeat of the foremost British professionals, Vardon and Ray, at Brookline, and a tournament at Onwentsia, while there are chapters also on the development of American golf and the management of our golfing clubs. He describes golf in Canada, in France, Spain, and Italy, on the Riviera and in the Pyrenees, and he has an argument to present in favor of British golf courses with which nobody can seriously disagree.

But, as a whole, Mr. Leach's new book is chiefly noteworthy as an exposition of the golfing character and a study of the human peculiarities associated with the game. To enjoy it most one must have had some experience as a golfer. To appreciate Mr. Leach's ideal of the happy golfer perhaps one who has too often permitted the quality of his own golf to make him unhappy is best qualified.

Christianity

The Rev. Dr. Adolph A. Berle, Director of the New England Civics Institute, implicitly believes that to secure enduring social advance we must build upon a moral and spiritual base; he finds this base, he says, in historic Christianity, his view being that in the historical unfolding of civilization the constant factor of growth has been an "increasing acceptance of the moral and spiritual sanctions which Jesus Christ laid down in the Christian Gospel." These opinions Dr. Berle sets forth in a volume entitled "Christianity and the Social Rage," and along with them he presents some sharp criticisms of "impatient idealists" and "fanatical reformers" who seem to be carried away by an irrational rage for change, which in the case of a projected reform defeats the very purposes for which the reform originally was begun. BELGIUM

Amazing Industry of a Nation That Faces Ruin

BELGIUM, HER KINGS, KINGDOM, AND PEOPLE. By John de Courcy MacDonnell. With photogravure portrait and fifty other portraits and illustrations. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. $3.50 net.

THAT portion of this book which deals with the trade life of Belgium brings to the mind of the American reader in vivid fashion just what the present war means to this industrially ruined land of hard-working, thrifty men and women.

The industrial story is that of a country which in eighty-four years—since 1830, when she threw off the Dutch yoke and became an independent kingdom—through diligence and commercial ability has become the sixth nation of the world in extent of yearly trade done. It is shown that in 1912 Belgium's combined imports and exports totaled $1,781,897,550. This sum is surpassed only by the trade of the United Kingdom, Germany, the United States, France, and the Netherlands. Belgium's trade has slightly exceeded that done by three of the great powers—Austria-Hungary, Russia, and Italy—as well as the vast trade of British India. What Belgian national independence, plus Belgian energy and brains, has accomplished in this comparatively brief period in the life of a nation is shown by the fact that in 1831 the total trade, exports and imports combined, was but $37,308,760. At this time the country had a population of slightly over 4,000,000, while the population now is but slightly over 7,500,000, yet the trade is forty-eight times as great. Freedom from Dutch domination, the business abilities of King Albert's predecessors—Leopold I. and Leopold II.—and the commercial genius of the Belgians themselves have wrought the marvel.

The author, who resided for twelve years in Brussels and who interestingly writes with much sympathy of the Belgians and with much praise, gives the text for the modern story of the country in his opening sentence: "To ceaseless industry the Belgian people owe their national existence." He goes on to declare that this industry has placed Belgium, relatively to its population, "at the head of the two worlds in economic competition."

Belgium may literally be said to be a nation of workers, for Mr. MacDonnell states that 40 per cent. of the inhabitants, including the males and females of every age, work at regular callings. So abhorred is idleness that many persons follow more than one trade, working at different pursuits in different seasons. Brabant male villagers, for instance, are brickmakers or harvesters in Summer and Autumn and lacemakers in Winter. More than 40 per cent. of the laborers in Belgium are occupied in handicrafts other than those of agriculture.

Of the nation's ante-bellum prosperity the author writes:

> The more the figures relating to imports and exports are analyzed the clearer becomes the proof of the country's prosperity. A large quantity of the imports to Belgium consists of raw material, which, handled by skilled Belgian workmen, vastly increases the country's wealth. Belgium enriches herself by what she retains at home as well as what she exports. Economists assert that, so rich is the country, her purchases abroad are made entirely from revenue. * * *
> Relying on the returns relating to imports, exports, and population published by various Governments, Belgians assert that their country's industry is greater than that of any other country in the world. The product of labor, as summarized by them, is, per head, as follows: Belgium, £22 1s 10d; England, £20 18s; Germany, £10 10s 10d; France, £9 17s 6d; the United States, £6 10s 10d; Italy, £4 11s 8d; Austria-Hungary, £3 11s 6d; Japan, £1 8s; Russia in Europe, £1 8s; Finland, £1 5s 10d.

The money earned by the Belgians goes not into the hands of few, but of many. The number of employed increases in greater proportion than the number of employers or persons working on their own account. Trusts, in the author's words, "have not proved terrific in Belgium," while the only millionaire "who has succeeded in obtaining control of an industry, M. Solvey of soda fame, is more of a beneficent Liberal, with strongly marked Socialistic sympathies, than a grinding tyrant."

It is the Belgian boast, says the author, that they alone of Continental peoples have full freedom of speech and organization. The workmen have used this freedom to organize, and they have obtained notable advances in wages. In the last fifty years wages in all pursuits have increased and in most they have doubled.

King Albert, who succeeded his uncle in 1909, is described as "the people's King" and declared the most popular of Belgian sovereigns. His wife is a German, a Bavarian Princess. Leopold I. had been a German, too, having been Prince of Saxe-Coburg. Belgian politicians before the accession of Albert thought him a weakling, because he had been so much in the background while Leopold II. reigned. They "were speedily undeceived when he came to the throne." He has exhibited the same spirit of mastery which characterized the two Leopolds; he "inclines to no party, is swayed by no clique, but, with even mind, seeks ever the advancement of his people and his country's good."

Things Seen in Sweden

In a little book entitled "Things Seen in Sweden" W. Barnes Steveni gives us an entertaining description of a charming country and a picturesque people. There are fifty illustrations in the book. (E. P. Dutton & Co. 75 cents.)

HERE'S a keen, exciting story by one of America's great fiction writers who knows Indians and Indian fighters.

Dr. Brady tells the dramatic story of the Custer massacre in a way that has never been surpassed. It's the climax of as fine a tale as you would want to read.

TOPICS OF THE WEEK

THERE are few writers whose work has won a place in international literature who have remained so closely indentified with their native haunts as WASHINGTON IRVING. New York has produced other men and women who have achieved a not unenviable literary fame, but IRVING remains the city's foremost man of letters, the writer whose penetrating humor and delightful faculty for giving a local habitation to the children of his fancy, will ever be associated with the land of his birth. It is thus eminently appropriate that in the Tercentenary exhibition at the New York Public Library a special room should be devoted to the original manuscripts, first editions, letters, pictures, &c., of the author of the immortal Knickerbocker History, who was, by the way, the first President of the Board of Trustees of the Astor Library. The collection forming this special exhibition belongs to MR. ISAAC N. SELIGMAN and is probably the most complete of the kind. Its principal feature unquestionably is an unpublished journal in which IRVING relates the incidents connected with his travels through France, Sicily, Italy, and Holland. This journal fills two large manuscript volumes, and although it was probably not avowedly written for publication, it is strange that it has eluded the publisher all these years. IRVING was a keen observer of men and affairs of his day. What he saw he turned into literature with a gentle touch of humor that was peculiar to his genius as a writer. It is difficult to imagine a man better equipped by nature and training than IRVING to furnish an entertaining book of travels. His unpublished journal portrays the Europe of his day as he saw it on the occasion of his first youthful tour of the Continent. Doubtless it contains numerous observations of a personal intimate character that the author set down for his private amusement. But coming from a man of such importance in literature as WASHINGTON IRVING this will scarcely be rated as a blemish. In reality it enhances the value of a journal whose publication at this time would contribute an eminently appropriate feature to New York's Tercentenary celebration.

THOSE who are versed in the theories of criminal psychology will doubtless find an abundance of curious and interesting material in Sir MELVILLE MACNAGHTEN'S "Days of My Years," a book that has just made its appearance in London. Two years ago Sir MELVILLE retired from his position as head of the Criminal Investigation Department at Scotland Yard. His career as a London detective covers a period of twenty-four years, and his book is naturally concerned with the details of most of the famous crimes that came under his observation during that time. The Whitechapel murders furnished him his initial experiences at Scotland Yard, and in his present volume of reminiscences he gives it as his belief that the "Jack the Ripper" of that strange series of crimes was a sexual maniac who committed suicide in 1888. He finds the same criminal impulses at the root of the Crippen Case, and in that of Dr. NEIL CREAM, the Lambeth poisoner of 1892. Sir MELVILLE'S theory regarding the Whitechapel murders corroborates to a large extent the theory cleverly elaborated by Mrs. BELLOC-LOWNDES in her last story, "The Lodger."

FOR the last two decades few literary men visiting this country for the first time have escaped the New York skyscraper. Whether this is due to the machinations of the interviewer who first buttonholes the new arrival, or whether the skyscraper really is the most impressive thing that we have to offer wandering poets, playwrights, and novelists, it would be difficult to say. It is pleasant to note, however, that the latest pilgrim of this kind from abroad, M. BRIEUX, is delighted with the skyscraper. When DICKENS visited this country more than seventy years ago, there were no skyscrapers to attract his attention—but there were cuspidors and, abnormally elevated boot soles, and his animadversions on the subject were not pleasant reading. At any rate, taking DICKENS'S visit as a starting point, the lapse of seventy years shows a gratifying enlargement of the American landscape as seen by the literary foreigner.

IN spite of its Scriptural authority one rather deprecates a too literal acceptance of the adage "there is nothing new under the sun." In a sense there is nothing old under the sun. Every age has a new way of looking at things, and although the "things" themselves may be old they acquire novelty through this changed point of view from which they are regarded. Hence one is disposed to grant the possibilities implied in the title of the weekly "journal of opinion"—The New Republic—the first number of which has just made its appearance. The six editors who are announced as responsible for the conduct of this new periodical belong to what is rather vaguely termed the younger generation in literature and politics, a fact increasing the likelihood that The New Republic will live up to its name. Nevertheless, it is a little difficult to discover wherein the novelty of The New Republic is to be found. We are told that "it is an attempt to find national audience for a journal of interpretation and opinion," as if that comprised its claim to being "new." At first glance there is nothing especially distinctive in this. Few journals, whether daily, weekly, or monthly, fail to contribute something in the way of "interpretation and opinion" in fields commanding for the time being public interest. A journal, however, that confines its columns exclusively to editorial criticism of the varying tendencies of modern times has not often been attempted in this country. ADDISON and STEELE immortalized this type of journalism in The Spectator of their day, and it has been received with more or less favor in England ever since. Its success in this or any country depends, of course, on the depth and sincerity of the "interpretation and opinion" filling its columns.

THE trouble with the so-called younger generation in literature, when venturing on such enterprises as The New Republic, is apt to be a somewhat exaggerated notion of the "message" that is to be delivered to mankind. The young literary enthusiast is generally the discoverer of a new world, which he takes to be quite different from the poor, decrepit old world in which he finds himself. If his "message" fails to attract attention, it is because of its "radicalism"—a failure that brings its compensations in the feeling of kinship with other "martyrs in the cause of truth" that is thus produced. More often, however, this boasted radicalism turns out to be not particularly radical, its lack of originality being the real cause for its failure to make an impression. History, of course, furnishes many an instance of the persecution that has been visited on the head of the independent thinker. But today a wider culture, a broader way of looking at things, has changed the conditions that used to give birth to our martyrs. An originality that is not mere eccentricity, that is really creative, is sure of a hearing. The literary journal that sincerely cultivates it, and thus stimulates the thought of its generation, is more certain of success than ever before. Hence, there may be plenty of room for The New Republic.

IT is natural that in the literature of war a prominent place should be accorded to TOLSTOY'S "War and Peace." By many this chronicle of the French invasion of Russia a century ago, with its historic portraits of NAPOLEON, KUTUZOFF, and the CZAR, is regarded as its author's masterwork in fiction. For a vivid portrayal of the Russian soldier, however, TOLSTOY'S "Sevastopol" is in many respects more remarkable than the novel that achieved a greater degree of fame. In "Sevastopol" TOLSTOY describes his own experiences as a soldier when, sixty years ago, he fought the French and English in a war which, as MR. AYLMER MAUDE points out, "resembled the intrenched fighting now going on in France." "Sevastopol" was among the earlier of TOLSTOY'S literary ventures, and hardly evinces the matured strength characterizing his later essays in fiction. MR. MAUDE, however, emphasizes the interesting fact that "there is no other case in literature in which so great a writer has described so great a fight after himself taking so intimate a part in it; and assuredly no one else has ever revealed the heart and mind of the Russian soldier with such penetrating insight."

AS the Christmas season approaches one involuntarily exclaims, "Now that ANDREW LANG has gone, who will give us a fairy book this year?" For something like twenty-five years MR. LANG, with the able assistance of his wife, made it a custom to bring out an annual Christmas fairy book. The series that thus grew under the magic of his name and industry remains an appropriate and lasting monument to his memory. Each year the Lang fairies appeared in a different color; the stories that they told seemed as infinite in variety as the combinations of hue offered by the rainbow. Doubtless the lore of fairyland is not exhausted and still appeals to young and old. It has seldom reached mankind, however, through so sympathetic a medium as this departed Scotchman.

IN A FEW WORDS

THE author of "The Green Curve," those grim and realistic stories of modern war published two years ago over the pen name, "Ole Luk Oie," is Col. E. D. Swinton, now attached to the General Staff of the Allies and author of the famous "Eye Witness" dispatches from the headquarters of Field Marshal Sir John French. A new edition of the book over the author's name is in press.

It is a singular fact that since the beginning of the war there has been a greatly increased interest in Katrina Trask's peace play, "In the Vanguard." In the last two months this play has been successfully produced on the stage of the Municipal Theatre at Northampton, Mass.; it has been read in hundreds of schools, and requests for permission to produce it have come from almost every State in the Union. The publishers report that the sales of the book in the second year since publication have greatly exceeded those of the first year.

Marjorie Benton Cooke's "Bambi" has been translated into Swedish and is being published serially in a magazine in Sweden, where it will later be brought out in book form.

The late Pierre de Coulevain, whose real name was Mlle. Fabre, lived nearly forty years as a governess in rich families, mainly American, dwelling on the Continent. At the age of 36 she retired and began to write, living in the greatest seclusion in Paris or traveling about France.

Cecil Chesterton, younger brother of G. K. Chesterton and editor of The New Witness, will visit this country in January for a lecture tour, in the course of which he will speak upon many historical and literary subjects.

A worker in Ranidhara, India, has written to Emma C. Dowd asking permission to translate her "Polly of the Hospital Staff" into the vernacular because of the "help it will be to those not acquainted with the English language."

William Maxwell, author of "Salesmanship," is Second Vice President of the Edison Company, and, although he is less than 40 years old, can look back upon such varied occupations as canvasser, law student, law office clerk, credit manager, sales manager, and general manager of several industrial concerns. He has also written and sold a four-act play and numerous short stories and scenarios.

Marie Van Vorst is serving as a nurse in the American Ambulance Hospital in Paris.

A. Henry Savage-Landor, who disappeared in the war maelstrom last month, recently came to the surface again in France, having been acting as a dispatch bearer between Antwerp and Bordeaux for the Belgian Government. He had passed through the German lines six times without having been detected.

Charles Inman Barnard, author of "Paris War Days," has been Paris correspondent of The New York Tribune for sixteen years. He is Chairman of the Harvard Club of Paris and President of the Association of the Foreign Press in that city.

Edith Wharton is writing "Impressions of War Scenes in Paris," which will be published in early numbers of Scribner's Magazine.

H. G. C. PERY-AYSCOUGH, co-author of "With the Russians in Mongolia," who has been for some time in the Chinese Postal Service, is returning to England to join his old regiment, the Royal Enniskillen Fusileers.

allow him to give up the brilliant opening in his career that his South American engagement offered. So, while she slowly travels toward death, she writes letters that are full of the tenderest love, bright hopefulness and exalted feeling. The slender volume is built upon a simple story scheme, but it is unusual in its refinement of touch and in the delicacy with which it infuses the tale with the fragrance of love.

THE NIGHT WIND'S PROMISE

THE NIGHT WIND'S PROMISE. By Varick Varmady. New York: G. W. Dillingham Company. $1.25.

This is the third and, the publishers announce, the final story in the series of novels dealing with the doings of Bingham Harvard, bank clerk and athlete, who, endeavoring to elude arrest for a crime he had not committed, showed such swiftness of action and such remarkable strength that the police of several cities named him "The Night Wind." That was the first novel. In this third story he is the honored and successful President of a bank and the devoted husband of the woman who, as a private detective, had been one of those who did their best to capture him in the first book. The scenes of this new novel are laid in and about New York and the plot is based upon the attempt of a handsome and daring criminal to impersonate an American of wealth and secure a large amount of money which he has on deposit in Bingham Harvard's bank. He succeeds in getting the money and he also abducts Harvard's wife and for a time it looks as if he would succeed in getting out of the country with both booty and woman. The story has considerable complication of plot and much perilous and exciting activity, but it does not compare well with the earlier stories of the series. It lacks the swift, spontaneous movement that characterized them and it is overweighted with conversations that run to long speeches.

WE ARE FRENCH

WE ARE FRENCH. By Perley Poore Sheehan and Robert H. Davis. New York: George H. Doran Company. 50 cents.

This little story moves along swiftly with quite a stir and color of life in its pages, with sustained emotional intensity and many dramatic moments. It opens in a village in eastern France, and is concerned with two old soldiers who had spent seven years of their young manhood with the Legion in Algiers. Once while there they had been captured and one of them, a bugler, ordered by their Arab captors to blow the "Retreat" under promise of torture if he does not, blows a furious "Charge" and the Legion wins the battle. They are old men when the story opens, peasants, bent and white-haired, but the bugler's companion never tires of telling of that glorious moment. Finally, the one-time savior of the day is summoned to Paris to be made a chevalier of the Legion of Honor and the two old "sousous" march thither on foot. And on the way and in Paris there befall romance and tragedy. The story goes with a romantic swing and the characters of the two old men, especially of the one who does most of the talking and remembers with reverence the bugler's achievement, stand out, full of life.

A CHRISTMAS PARTY

Before she won wide attention by her prize story Leona Dalrymple had written several Christmas tales about a Southern household and a faithful old negro retainer named Uncle Noah. She follows these now with another novelette, specially suited to the holiday season, called "Uncle Noah's Christmas Party," (McBride, Nast & Co., $1.) The Southern household is not as prosperous as it once had been, and some of the family silver had been sold to provide ready money. Uncle Noah decides that he will buy it back as a Christmas present for his master, Col. Fairfax. He goes about it surreptitiously, and in the course of his midnight journey runs upon a mysterious adventure, the outcome of which decides him to have a Christmas party of his own in the barn. He invites an old lady in an old-fashioned lavender silk gown and some neglected Italian children. And while his party is in progress he finds that he has uncovered an old and painful romance that in the glow of his Christmas tree comes to a happier conclusion. The little book has several page illustrations in color by Charles L. Wrenn and marginal decorations in tint by Charles H. Guischard.

YOURSELF AND THE NEIGHBORS

YOURSELF AND THE NEIGHBORS. By Seumas MacManus. Illustrated by Thomas Fogarty. New York: The Devin-Adair Company.

Is Ireland, as certain poets would have us believe, a place of haunted hills and shadowy waters, inhabited by the melancholy Sidhe? Or is it, as Synge told us, a barbarous land, where patricide wins for the criminal universal adoration? It is neither, according to one who knows the country and its people with a knowledge far more intimate than that of Mr. Yeats or the late John Synge—Seumas MacManus of Donegal.

"Yourself and the Neighbors" is not a collection of studies of Irish life; it is a book of stories by the champion story-teller of a nation of story-tellers. But it gives the reader a clearer idea of the men, women, and children who lived among the hills of Knockagar a generation ago than the most exhaustive treatise or the most relentlessly realistic analysis.

One of Mr. MacManus's devices for making his tales more vivid (it was not unknown to the late Donald Mitchell) consists in using "you" for his hero. That is, he tells how you herded the cows at daybreak and, standing bare-footed in the frosty pasture, watched the red sun roll over the shoulder of Barnes Mor; how you fought the Back-o'-the-Hill boys and rode to the town with your father on top of Jimmy Kelly's turf cart; how you courted and won Molly Gilride, saw your children grow up around you, and sank to rest beneath the green sod of Killymard. He reminds you of the old friends of your boyhood days, of the village Postmistress, the schoolmaster, the beggarmen, the "come-home Yankees."

He tells again the stories you loved—of Raftery and of the Gentle People—tells them as skillfully as any shanachie that ever sat in a chimney corner. He recreates the life of an Irish countryside; he puts, indeed, the very soul of his race into language that is colloquial but exquisite, now tense with passion, now shaken with mirth. He has art and knowledge and sympathy, and he has put them all into this entertaining and lovable book.

ALTOGETHER JANE

ALTOGETHER JANE. By Herself. Mitchell Kennerley. $1.35 net.

This new book is professedly the history of a woman writer who, being accused of putting too much of herself into her stories, decides to write one which shall be entirely about herself—"Altogether Jane," and nothing else. She begins with her earliest recollections, and presents a rather attractive picture of a sensitive, talented child—that Jane is an unusual and decidedly gifted person is an impression which the author strives to convey throughout the book's sixty-five chapters, not very successfully. She was brought up in the old-fashioned school of many whippings and parental omnipotence, against which she makes a rather vigorous plea. At about sixteen she becomes engaged, and three years later is married to a man whose character never takes on any very definite shape to the reader. Meanwhile there have been religious doubts, a relinquishment of the creed which she had formerly accepted without question, and attempts at authorship. Follows maternity, many struggles with poverty, and a love affair. When the book ends Jane is middle aged and somewhat battered and bruised, but she has "kept herself sweet, and so retained her possibility for happiness."

Much of the book is well done, Jane's childhood and youth are prettily described, her relations with her own "Boy" have a certain charm and pathos, and the scenes of her mother's death and her own grief are pictured with truth and poignancy. But the reader never believes in the remarkable capabilities which, according to Jane, might have made of her "a singer, an actress, or a writer," is inclined to smile at her interview with the man "at the top of the stage," who takes so calmly her modest proposal that he star her at once, and has a strong conviction that it was not her originality but her verbosity which caused so many editors to turn down her manuscripts. Of the other characters, only the mother is ever real. The rest of them are a mere series of shadow shapes. However, the book has promise despite its many faults.

THE BLOSSOMING ROD

THE BLOSSOMING ROD. By Mary Stewart Cutting. With frontispiece. Doubleday, Page & Co.

Mrs. Cutting's charming little Christmas story is "for every one who loves the Day," and certainly many of those who love the day will enjoy hearing about Langshaw and the fishing-rod which "ceased to be a mere bundle of sticks," but was transformed "into one blossoming with love."

It is a simple enough little tale—one which reflects the experiences of many of those quiet, honest, obscure, hard-working, affectionate families whose homes are really homes, whether they live in suburban cottages, as the Langshaws did, or in city flats. And it is well that the genuine beauty of commonplace lives like these should be so put before us by the magic of talent and a sympathetic insight that even our often blind or averted eyes cannot fail to see it. The old-fashioned, sickly sentimental Christmas story was—and is—a thing to sour the milk of human kindness; but we are all the better and the sweeter natured for reading of such episodes as this of Langshaw and his Christmas present.

THE WARD OF TECUMSEH

THE WARD OF TECUMSEH. By Cleveland Marriott. Illustrated by Frank Mekerman. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company. $1.25.

It is a romantic and interesting background that Mr. Marriott chooses for his story of love and adventure, although of the kind that rarely brings conviction. His action takes place in 1812 and 1813, and most of it is in the wilderness of the Northwest Territory, in the regions that are now Ohio, Indiana, and Michigan. The scenery of such a staging depends so much upon the imagination of the novelist that even the greatest skill will have difficulty in making the reader feel the breath of actuality in the pages. Mr. Marriott goes at his task in what is perhaps the best manner, that of pure romance. He starts out with a lovely maiden of Huguenot descent, whose father, of a titled French family, had lived much with the Shawnee Indians, and on his death had left her in the care of Tecumseh, the Shawnee Chief. A relative of the British branch of the family, a disreputable British officer, goes in search of her, intending to marry her and secure the estates to which she is heiress. A young scion of the American branch rushes to her rescue. But she has already elected to remain with the Indians and spy for them against the whites. That is the situation at the opening of the story, which leads the reader through the Western wilderness, with much stirring adventure and with many hair-breadth escapes of one or another of the chief characters. There are intrigues and battles between the Americans and the combined forces of the British and the Indians, and all manner of dangers blockade the path of the heroic young American, bent on saving Tecumseh's ward. There is a very good portrayal also of Tecumseh himself, with his passionate desire to form an Indian empire.

PERSONS UNKNOWN

PERSONS UNKNOWN. By Virginia Tracy. Illustrated by Henry Raleigh. New York: The Century Company. $1.35.

Considering that it is a first novel, the author of this story of a mysterious crime deserves not a little commendation. For it shows remarkable fertility of invention, an active and nimble fancy, and a style whose imaginative quality gives promise of better things. The story suffers, indeed, from too luxuriant an abundance of these factors, or, perhaps it would be better to say, too unbridled a use of them. The author must learn, for the sake of the greater plausibility it will give, to use her gifts with more discretion. She is prone to give her imagination such a loose rein that it gallops away into all sorts of unconvincing fantastic developments. That sort of an imagination is much more desirable in a young author than one that is plodding and heavy, but it needs a lot more watching and training.

The story has a double interest, although the two are so closely intertwined—and this is skilfully done—that its central theme is practically a single thread. A mysterious murder, and closely connected with it a love affair, with the woman under suspicion of having committed the murder, quickly engage the attention of the reader. An ambitious young novelist, about to get his first manuscript published, sitting at his window on a hot night, sees the shadow of a woman with an arm raised in dramatic gesture on a window shade across the street and a moment later hears a shot. When with the police he enters the apartment, he finds no one there save the dead body, with a bullet hole in the breast, of the man who was about to publish his book. So the story opens, and then develops into widespread, rather rambling complications, which include some operations of the Camorra, transplanted from Italy, and some excursions into the misdeeds of a previous generation. The scenes are all laid in and about New York City.

LATEST FICTION

Novels by Pierre de Coulevain, E. T. Thurston and Others

THE WONDERFUL ROMANCE. By Pierre de Coulevain. Translated by Alys Hallard. Dodd, Mead & Co.

THIS, the latest book to be translated from the French of Pierre de Coulevain, is also the last book she wrote before her death, though possibly there may be another earlier volume still waiting translation. In reading some of the paragraphs of this long reflection upon life and life's meanings and impulses, for such in truth the book is, one notices a premonition:

> "Remember, I have your promise," she said, still holding my hand. "You are coming to Louvic. You have sown the seed; you must come and see it sprouting."
> I nodded without speaking. A kind of superstitious fear prevents me now from making any plans or giving verbal promise.

Not that the book is morbid. On the contrary, it is sunny with optimism, is indeed a sincere, almost a passionate, protest against a cynical or a despondent attitude toward "The Wonderful Romance," which is none else than existence itself. The writer relates how she came to take what she terms an objective rather than a subjective view of life, looking for causes behind the effects, sad or joyful, with which she was brought into more or less intimate contact, rather than studying her own reactions. This vision, she tells us, "has revealed, and continues to reveal, to me the incommensurable greatness of our atom lives."

The book is the most personal the author has given us, though all her stories are frank relations of personal experience. But here she puts down her philosophy, more in the style of a long essay interrupted by what the papers call human interest stories, and by what, in an elder day, might very likely have been described as "Polite Conversations." The result of this unconventional method and somewhat desultory plan is singularly agreeable. The thoughts are by no means always new, but they are good thoughts and true thoughts, expressed with grace and that feminine charm so marked in this Frenchwoman. She has an intense sympathy for people, an unquenchable curiosity. The slightest incident, a boy sitting asleep in the sun, a flower thrown aside, a girl opening a letter, anything sets her mind working, leads her away, and the reader with her, on all sorts of odd pilgrimages and fanciful imaginings.

She attempts, in this latest work, to approach all the greater forces that move mankind with the idea of seeing from what they flow and to what they lead. Thus she studies love, dreams, religion, sorrow. Always there are stories—stories she has watched, stories that have been told her. And always she seeks to prove that we are in the hands of Providence, not free agents, and that this Providence is constantly working for good, using our evil and our weakness to the same end, parcelling out grief, loss, gain and happiness, not for our own sakes, but for ultimate results.

Our own responsibility lies in fulfilling our destiny to the utmost, and in recognizing that we are the agents of Divine force. With this in mind the author finds the disappointments, the sufferings of her life to have been worth while, and she regrets nothing. Behind everything is the great pattern of good, and enduring happiness lies in realizing this.

It is a comforting book, full of straightforward simplicity, and today, when a good many well-meaning people are shouting that God's plans have gone astray and that we are all rushing to destruction like a ship on fire, it is a good book to keep on the table. This old woman, full of courage and kindness, is a companion worth making an intimate of, whether or no you agree with her conclusions. She closes her book with the expectation of starting to Rome, there to spend Christmas with some American friends. "Is it not rather late in the day for me to make another pilgrimage to the Eternal City?" she asks. "I feel how thin the thread of my life now is * * * but it is hard to leave Life now when I see it so immense, beautiful with an immortal beauty. Courage will come to me."

She did not set out to Rome, for she fell dead, shortly after writing the above words, in Switzerland. The book, which she called her barque, "The Why," is the best thing she has done, both for its literary excellence and its depth of thought. The translation is admirable.

ACHIEVEMENT

ACHIEVEMENT. By E. Temple Thurston. D. Appleton & Co. $1.35 net.

THIS is the third and last of the series of novels wherein are related the history of Richard Furlong, the famous artist. It begins with the death of his wife, Constance, at the birth of their child, and traces the development of Dicky Furlong to his full growth and the final "Achievement" which comes with the painting of his great picture, "Romance." Between these two events many things happened and more than one woman entered his life, for it is Mr. Thurston's theory that the woman is "the father of the children of his"—i. e., man's—"brain." Dicky Furlong worked "under the influence of women all through his life," and she who stimulated him to highest endeavor was by no means the worthiest of them all.

First after the death of Constance came Mrs. Flint, his father's housekeeper, whom he met when immediately after his bereavement he fled from London to his old home at the Mill. It was she whose interest did so much to arouse him from his lethargy, she who insisted that without his work a man was a mere sipher. And she gave him a fine and generous love, in exchange for which he had but little to offer. Her nature and feelings are admirably analysed; she is a creature of flesh and blood, presented sympathetically and with real understanding. It was she, too, who helped Dicky at the very end, helped him "as no other could have done." Then came the girl who was his model for his first notable portrait, "Jade," and one or two others, each of whom had a more or less marked effect upon his development, and at last the woman who was the great love of his life, Lady Diana Charteris, intelligent, rich, beautiful, socially important, and married to a man whom she herself termed "a cad." A fascinating woman, not a great one; for "luxury, ease and idleness, these are not sustenance for the great of heart," and upon these Diana had been nourished all her life. From such a love only tragedy could come, and come it does, swift and sure.

All these different women are drawn with firm, clear strokes. Fanny Cornish, Mrs. Samby, the elderly char-woman into whose life Dicky brought all that it had ever known of laughter, Mrs. Flint and the Lady Diana, who rather enjoyed playing "Lady Hamilton to his Romney"—they are each distinct, very much alive. Nevertheless, one of the very best portions of the novel is that in which they play no part; the scenes attending Constance's funeral: The dreadful preparations, Mrs. Baldwin's regret that she had not expended the extra five shillings which would have secured a black horse with a long tail, Dicky's grief that sent him wandering for three days among the streets and finally drove him from London to where the Avon, "that winding bend of silver, interlaced by the banks and the willows," reawakened his sense of beauty, making him feel himself no longer alone—all this could scarcely be improved. His encounters with his father, when the old inability to understand rises between them coupled with a new affection and with a new jealousy as well, are also admirably done—so admirably done that one cannot but be doubly sorry that the author should have seen fit to introduce so melodramatic an episode as the failure of Furlong Senior, and Dicky's purchase of the old Mill, an incident which badly mars an otherwise artistic book. Fortunately it is soon over, and we are glad to forget it in the interest of his first meeting with Diana Charteris and the beginning for him of that "one love in a man's life that is unlike and transcends all other," the love which presently forced him to face the great battle between flesh and spirit, the battle from which he was at last to emerge victorious. So the other threatened spiritual tragedy was averted; that a material one came was the decree of fate—and Dicky's work was done.

In the writing of his novel Mr. Thurston has attained to a style at once simple, clear, and poetic. Dramatic, too, at certain moments, devoid of mere verbiage. Dicky himself is portrayed in all his various moods and phases; grief-stricken, flushed with eagerness over his wonderful colored wood engraving, when at last the perfect print came from the machine Mr. Nibbs tended so lovingly; furiously enraged, even to bloodlust, by the torture of a dog; idealist through and through, seeing beauty even in the smoking furnaces and belching chimneys of the Northern factory town; often enthusiastic, always full of vitality, quick to feel and to understand. It is true and fitting that in the end his life should be crowned by "Achievement"—achievement both in what he did and in what he was.

ANNE FEVERSHAM

ANNE FEVERSHAM. By J. C. Smith. D. Appleton & Co. $1.35 net.

IN this new novel the author of "Broke of Covedon" has turned away from the present time to the days of the great Elizabeth, and attempted about as difficult a feat as any writer could well try to perform—he has striven to draw a portrait of Shakespeare. It is Shakespeare who is both the deus ex machina and the real hero of the book; it is he who befriends the hapless fugitives, Gervase Heriot and Anne Feversham, the one condemned to death and with a price upon his head, the other his rescuer and loyal comrade, and finally brings happiness to them. For, thanks to the machinations of several wicked men, Gervase had been accused of complicity in a Popish plot against the life of Elizabeth, and, although entirely innocent, been cast into prison in Nottingham Castle, and condemned to the block. From this fate beautiful, high-spirited Anne Feversham, only daughter and heiress of the Constable of Nottingham, saved him at almost the last moment, and together they fled through the country until it chanced that they met one William Shakespeare, an actor in the Lord Chamberlain's famous company. To him they told their story, and from that instant it is his efforts to prove Gervase's innocence and win a pardon for the lovers, which form the thread of the plot—efforts which very nearly brought his own head beneath the executioner's ax.

As a story "Anne Feversham" is at once interesting and charming. It is well written, it moves briskly, and there are any number of exciting episodes, from the thrilling escape from the castle until it all culminates in the first performance of "As You Like It," given at Richmond Park before the Queen herself and by her command—the performance in which Anne played the part of Rosalind under Shakespeare's own guidance. "He was all kindness, all tenderness, all forethought, and concern." They might well have won hearts far harder than those of Shakespeare and his associates, this true and gallant pair of lovers.

But when all is said of them and their adventures, it is Shakespeare who is the very soul and spirit of the book. Mr. Snaith has in truth fairly justified his audacity in endeavoring to portray this "man of men." His Shakespeare is many-sided, brave and gentle, gay and sad, loving and lovable—and cursed with that "penalty of high imagination," as Richard Burbage calls it, "the disease of not being able to know your own mind." His relations with his dear friend Burbage, the devoted companion who felt that upon him lay the charge "of watching over this man who was not as other men," a charge he strove to accomplish even at the cost of life itself, are sympathetically and vividly drawn. It is the Shakespeare who exclaimed:

> "Meanwhile greet me friend, good fellow, > Gentle Will, my merry men!"

that Mr. Snaith places before us, but he also shows us something of the crushing weight of a sympathy, an insight, and an understanding far transcending those of ordinary men. There is plenty of light and shadow, and the practical man of affairs who bought the largest house in Stratford is not neglected. The book is bright, too, with the color of that rich and splendid age. Besides Shakespeare, we have glimpses of Bacon and Cecil, of Raleigh and Elizabeth—the "raddled old woman" men called Gloriana—and of Mistress Mary Fytton, whom Mr. Snaith evidently identifies with the dark lady of the sonnets.

THREE LOVE STORIES.

JULIE M. LIPPMANN'S "Martha" books have won an army of readers who will be just as much pleased with the new one, "Martha and Cupid," (Henry Holt & Co., $1,) in which the big, lovable Irish woman meets with some vicissitudes and is carried through a long section of her life. In the first part of the book she takes her time, in a most leisurely fashion, to choose between two lovers, but finally selects one of them, because the other "can shift for himself." The rest of the book is concerned with the ups and downs of their married life, which give Martha many occasions to show her characteristic composure, good nature, and facetious confidence in herself. She succeeds also in getting a husband for her mother and before the book ends one of her own daughters is married, after an experience during which Martha feels it necessary to "hold her beau" for her until she returns to her proper senses. The story is written with rather less spontaneity than appeared in the previous books, but it is of more complicated structure and contains more dramatic incident.

According to all the authorities upon pedagogics Dru Loveridge, in Beulah Marie Dix's story, "The Little God Ebisu" (Duffield & Company, $1.35), ought not to have been teaching school, because she hated it and longed to flee from its drudgery. And to bring about the possibility of flight she was accustomed to make small offerings of a bit of candy or a flower to a little image of the Japanese god of luck, Ebisu, which smiled upon her from her desk whenever she had time to look at it. And finally Ebisu did his duty and brought her an invitation to a week-end house party and the party delivered into her hands a handsome young lover. The course of true love ran through rose colored clouds for a time, and then it struck upon rocks, and after a while it turned out to be another and entirely different course of true love with another lover. The book is quite plainly and unpretentiously an old-fashioned love story—a type of novel that is getting to be very rare indeed in these days when novel reading is sometimes an intellectual exercise as strenuous as chess.

"Rosemary — for Remembrance" (George H. Doran Company, 75 cents), by Norman Bright Carson, is a tender little love story told in letters that breathe the highest ideals. They are written by a young wife in this country to her husband engaged in engineering work in South America. Threatened illness had made it impossible for her to accompany him and she had refused to

ANSWERS BY THE EDITOR

A. M. S. W.—Will you please tell me something about Rabindranath Tagore?

Rabindranath Tagore is at present the most commanding figure in the modern literature of India. His family has been prominent in Bengal for many generations, possessed of vast wealth, and distinguished for intellect. The family estates are the largest in Bengal. The poet's grandfather, Dwarakanath Tagore, was the founder of the Landholders' Society, while his father was a spiritual and intellectual leader in Bengal. He refused a high civic title and took instead that of Maharsi, which means "great sage." Under the wise instruction of his father Rabindranath, who was born in 1860, grew up in a way that developed his mystic and poetic nature. He developed rapidly and when he was 11 years old his father sent him to the Himalayas, where he studied the great classics of his country and of England. He visited England when he was 17 and perfected himself in the study of English. Returning to Bengal, he began writing the poems that have made him famous in India. When some of his poems were translated into English and published in England they created a great sensation in the literary world. It was soon after this that Tagore received the Nobel Prize for Literature, the first time that it was awarded to other than a white man.

One of the members of the Tagore family is the Hon. Maharajah Bahadur Sir Prodyot Coomar, who was knighted in 1906. He is a patron of music, a Trustee of the Indian Museum, and a member of many public bodies. Another distinguished member of the family is Rajah Sir Sourindro Mohun Tagore, who founded the Bengal Music School in 1871 and the Bengal Academy of Music ten years later. He has written many books in English, Sanskrit, and Bengali.

Mrs. E. B. GAYLORD.—Can you tell me the names of the publishers of the book "Lyle Macdonald," published fully forty years ago?

"Lyle MacDonald" was written by Mrs. S. F. Keene. It was one of the MacDonald series published between the years 1870 and 1875. The others were "Orient Boys," "Guy's Life Lesson," "Led," and "Viking Heir." A new edition in five volumes, price $7.50, was issued in 1875-76 by Henry Hoyt, 25 Bromfield Street, Boston, Mass. Hoyt's business was soon afterward taken over by Ira Bradley & Co., 162 Washington Street, Boston, a firm apparently no longer in existence.

M. D. S.—I have an old copy of "Klosterheim," by Thomas De Quincey, about which I should like some information. I have never found this work of De Quincey's anywhere, and have asked many times through different authorities, but cannot find that any one has ever heard of it. The title page reads thus: "Klosterheim; or, The Masque, with biographical preface by Dr. Shelton Mackenzie. Boston: Whittemore, Niles & Hall. N. Y.: J. C. Derby. Cincinnati: Moore, Wilstach, Keys & Co. 1855." The story is a historical novel at the end of the Thirty Years' War, and is most fascinating. I have had it for many years, as it was in my father's library.

Thomas De Quincey published his novel, "Klosterheim," in 1832. It never had much popularity, though it is said to have been dramatized with success at two London theatres. De Quincey was at the time living in Edinburgh, Scotland. "Klosterheim" and "The Logic of Political Economy" were his only separate publications. "The Confessions," reprinted from The London Magazine in 1822, passed through six editions before the new and greatly enlarged edition of 1856. His other works appeared in periodicals, chiefly in the London, Blackwood's, and Tait's Magazines. A full list of these, with dates of first appearance, is in Lowndes's Manual under De Quincey. The most complete edition of De Quincey's is the American, in twenty-two volumes, 1851-72. Dr. R. Shelton Mackenzie, author of the biographical preface, was a native of Ireland, who came to this country and became a well-known newspaper editor in Philadelphia. The 1855 issue of "Klosterheim" is not of special value. A copy of the first edition (1832) is worth about $10.

S. C. B.—Can you tell me the author and publisher of a short story supposed to represent an incident in the life of Phillips Brooks, entitled "The Bishop's Shadow" or "The Shadow of the Bishop"?

"The Bishop's Shadow," by I. T. Thurston, was published by Fleming H. Revell & Co., 158 Fifth Avenue, New York.

ANSWERS FROM READERS

GEORGE T. FLEMING.—The verses sought by L. W. Kearn in your issue of Sept. 20 are by A. S. Kieffer. I have them in Excell's School Songs, No. 4. The music there is by B. C. Unseld. The words are:

Twilight is stealing over the sea,
Shadows are falling dark on the lea;
Borne on the night winds, voices of yore
Come from the far-off shore.

CHORUS.

Far away beyond the starlit skies,
Where the love-light never, never dies,
Gleameth a mansion filled with delight,
Sweet, happy home so bright.

Voices of loved ones! Songs of the past
Still linger round me while life shall last;
Lonely I wander, sadly I roam,
Seeking that far-off home.

Come in the twilight, come, come to me!
Bringing some message over the sea,
Cheering my pathway while here I roam
Seeking that far-off home.

Answers to this appeal were also received from Ida E. Johnston, Morristown, N. J.; "J. G. N.," New York; "L. C. B.," New York, and "E. H.," New York.

L. S. BEST.—Here are the words of the hymn asked for by Emma A. Wetmore in your issue of Oct. 11, 1914:

God of the morning, at whose voice
The cheerful sun makes haste to rise,
And like a giant doth rejoice
To run his journey through the skies:

Oh, like the sun, may I fulfill
The appointed duties of the day;
With ready mind and active will,
March on and keep my heavenly way.

But I shall rove, and lose the race
If God my Sun should disappear
And leave me in this world's wide maze,
To follow every wandering star.

Give me Thy counsel for my guide;
And then receive me to Thy bliss;
All my desires and hopes beside
Are faint and cold compared with this.

H. S.—"J. A. R." asks in your issue of Oct. 18 concerning a poem beginning

In the bitter waves of woe,
Beaten and tossed about
By the sullen winds which blow
From the desolate shores of doubt.

This poem was written by Dr. Washington Gladden, the well-known writer of Columbus, Ohio. It consists of some eight verses under the title of "Ultima Veritas." It is included in a little book of Dr. Gladden's verses published by The Pilgrim Press.

Answers to this appeal were also received from Miss J. L. Henderson, Saranac Lake, N. Y.; Mrs. G. E. Henbach, Brooklyn, and "A. M. T.," Brooklyn.

MRS. GERTRUDE Y. DOOLEY.—The poem asked for by F. W. Carroll in your issue of Oct. 4 is "Night," by Helen Huntington, and runs as follows:

Night and the curtains drawn,
This household still,
Fate with appointed strength
Hath worked its will.
Close to the dying blaze
We sit alone,
Naught but the old day lost,
All else our own.

Far in the corners dim
The shadows start;
Near to your strength I cling
And near your heart.
Dearest, the whole world ends,
Ends well—in this—
Night—and the firelit dark,
Your touch, your kiss.

L. L. WHITLOCK.—The lines asked for by "R. C. B." in your issue of Oct. 4, (not quite correctly quoted,) are from Horace Smith's "Hymn to the Flowers." It should read, as I remember it:

In that cathedral, boundless as our wonder,
Whose quenchless lamps the sun and moon supply,
Its choir, the winds and waves; its organ, thunder;
Its dome, the sky!

This appeal was also answered by Mrs. W. D. Brooks, New York; "B. C. P.," Richmond Hill, N. Y.; and Elvina J. Seeley, Oswego, N. Y.

C. P. B.—Your correspondent, "Lawrence," in your issue of Sept. 6, is in error regarding Mrs. Welby's poem, though the extract from it is correctly quoted. The poem is not "little," being composed of ten stanzas of eight lines each, and is not named "Twilight at Sea," but "Musings"; the narrator is supposed to be watching the waves from the shore.

J. M. DANA.—The lines quoted by George S. Hawley in your issue of Oct. 4:

Others may sing the song,
Others may right the wrong.

can be found in Whittier's poem, "My Triumph."

R. D. C.—In answer to the "Appeal to Readers" on Oct. 11 of Marie Walters Kennedy, the lines she quotes are slightly different in my version. The verses are by Beth Slater Whitson and called "Possession":

The sunset dies, but lives again
In the poppy's crimson bloom;
The twilight fades, but silver stars
Shine through enfolding gloom.
Joy walks with us a little way,
Great as a joy can be;
Then drops our clinging hand and goes—
But ah, the memory!

ALFRED O. BLAISDELL.—The hymn asked for by Emma A. Wetmore in your issue of Oct. 11 is by Dr. Watts, and may be found in nearly every one of the older hymn books.

A. T.—Your correspondent, Mrs. L. C. Edmondson, in asking where she could find a book called "Our Daily Paths," by T. S. Arthur, states that she thinks T. S. Arthur was a Congregational minister, but he was a Swedenborgian, and Mrs. Edmondson could very likely obtain the book, or information about it, at either the Brooklyn Society of the New Church, at Clark Street and Monroe Place, or the New Church Society on Park Avenue and Thirty-fifth Street, New York City.

APPEALS TO READERS

F. L. P.—Will some reader furnish a poem beginning:

Darling, the day is over,
Ended the dream divine;
You must go back to your life,
I must go back to mine.

W. T. W.—I would like the entire poem of which the following is a part:

What have you to remember?
What have I to forget?
Laughter fests and trifles,
And yet—and yet!

R. S. J.—Could any of your readers tell me the rest of the following poem, also its author? All I know of it is:

You have kissed me back to the face of God,
You have kissed me back from the gates of hell,
. . . . . .
And a world of men shall hear from me.

L. L. L.—Can any reader tell me where to find the words, and who the author is, of these lines?

"They threw me a rose. I stepped on it. What cared I for a rose, when She, the Queen of all the roses, lay dead?"

ANNE E. DICKINSON.—Can any of your readers quote for me and give me the author of a piece of poetry in which a line somewhat like the following appears:

Lost: One golden hour from a day. . . .

Then it goes on, telling one to make the best of time, for it is limited.

THE RIVER

A Great Story of the New West

By EDNAH AIKEN

THE author has taken for her subject the truly great idea of the reclamation of the American Desert which in a large degree depends on the control of the all but untamable Colorado River, and subsequent extensive irrigation.

Thoroughly American in theme, ambitious, many-sided, and yet unified.

There is an absorbing plot in which one strong man is set against another, the wife of one of them is shown in her restless vanity and scheming, and a fine young girl comes to her own in the love of a man worthy of her.

The River stands out from among current fiction as a novel that has the right to be heard.

BOOKS WORTH READING

A PLEASING and instructive story is told by G. E. Mitton in "Round the Wonderful World" of a journey from London to London, via the Mediterranean, the Indian Ocean, the Pacific, British Columbia, Canada, the St. Lawrence, the North Atlantic, and Liverpool. The story includes picturesque descriptions of odd things seen in Spain, France, Italy, Egypt, India, China, and Japan. There are numerous illustrations, twelve of which reproduce in colors drawings by A. S. Forrest. (G. P. Putnam's Sons.)

Another London-to-London tour is dealt with by Maurice Baring in an illustrated book entitled "Round the World in Any Number of Days," the route in this case being by way of Australia, New Zealand, San Francisco, and New York. Mr. Baring's book is for the most part non-descriptive, the author's view being that the round-the-world tour has come to be a hackneyed affair, already more than sufficiently described. In place of description we find bits of humor, literary persiflage, and funny digs at famous English men of letters. It is only when he gets to this country that Mr. Baring gives us impressions of land and people. He seems to have taken a decided liking for America and Americans. (Houghton Mifflin Company. $1.25.)

Brief sketches of some of the women who figure in the Bible, Shakespeare, and mythology are presented by the Rev. Dr. Frank M. Bristol, Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in a volume entitled "Heroines of History." Among the author's heroines are Thetis, Iphigenia, Andromache, Penelope, Juliet, Ophelia, Portia, Lady Macbeth, Hermione, Imogen, Desdemona, Eve, Sarah, Rebecca, Rachel, Deborah, Abigail, Esther, Ruth, and Mary the Mother of Jesus. (Abingdon Press. $1.)

A volume entitled "The Panama Canal Tolls Controversy" contains a "statement of the reasons for the adoption and maintenance of the traditional American policy in the management of the Panama Canal," prepared by Hugh Gordon Miller, formerly special assistant to the Attorney General of the United States, and Joseph C. Freehoff, statistician with the Public Service Commission of New York City. There are three introductions to the authors' statement contributed by Secretary Bryan, Oscar S. Straus, and Senator Hughes of New Jersey. (Chapple Publishing Company.)

A number of subjects Americans are interested in are treated with notable intelligence in a volume entitled "Essays Historical and Political," which contains a collection of papers written by Charlemagne Tower, recently a distinguished American diplomat. There are two historical papers in the volume, one dealing with Lord Cornwallis's American career, and the other with Gen. Howe's campaigns in the Revolutionary War. The political papers include brief discussions of Europe's attitude toward the Monroe Doctrine, America's obligations with respect to the Panama Canal, and America's relations to arbitration for the settlement of international disputes. (J. B. Lippincott Company. $1.50.)

A scientific study of great value to dietists is contained in a volume entitled "Food Products," the work of Henry C. Sherman, Professor of Food Chemistry in Columbia University. To each important type of food a chapter is devoted, giving as the author expresses it:

> An account of the production of the food in question and its preparation for market, with such brief statistical data as will indicate the relative economic importance of the industry.
> The proximate composition of the food and its general food value.
> Facts relating to the sanitation and inspection of the food and its standards of purity.
> Special characteristics of the food with respect to composition, digestibility, nutritive value, and place in the diet.

In an appendix there will be found a compilation of data relating to food legislation and inspection. (Macmillan Company. $2.25.)

A brief treatise on intercessory prayer written by Florence L. Barclay, author of "The Rosary," is published in a little book entitled "The Golden Censer." In it the author gives some interesting views as to the efficiency of petitions for divine help and guidance. (George H. Doran Company. 50 cents.)

A series of studies in social and spiritual values is presented by the Rev. Edgar De Witt Jones in a book entitled "The Inner Circle"; they are based, we are told, on the life and teaching of Jesus, breathe His spirit and represent Christian life as conceived and illustrated by Him. The author is a popular preacher in Cincinnati. (Fleming H. Revell Company. $1.)

Admirable advice for girls who earn their own living is given by Mary A. Laselle in "The Young Woman Worker." She shows that efficiency and advancement result from well-directed effort, and that intelligent and conscientious attention to what at first thought may seem trivialities is part of the price a girl must pay for success. Good manners, good health, neat dress, an alert mind, and devotion to the employer's interest are among the topics with which the author deals. (Pilgrim Press.)

THE effect of the European war on social tradition in New York will be strongly in evidence this week. About this time of the year, for a long, long time, the annual Horse Show in Madison Square Garden has been mentioned in the same breath with the opening of the grand opera season. For years the two functions clashed, then the opening of the Horse Show was set back a day or so to avoid a conflict of dates. It seemed such a fixture in the social calendar. Now that it has been abandoned, owing to the war, fad and fashion are realizing the fact that the affairs of the day are closely allied to history-making events on the other side of the ocean.

New York is to have its Horse Show, however, and a very interesting exhibition is promised for early in December. Out of the many activities being planned to yield large returns for the aid of the destitute and suffering in the war zone has arisen a new dawn for the horse. So from Dec. 7 to Dec. 12 a Charity Horse Show is to be held at the Garden for the benefit of the Red and White Cross Societies, under the patronage of the Committee of Mercy.

The opera season alone stands impregnable against the rumblings of war, and a brilliant assembly of society will greet the opening of the season tomorrow night at the Metropolitan. The personnel of the list of boxholders surpasses in brilliance that of any previous year. Society will throng the Golden Horseshoe all season long.

Everybody, of course, is interested in the newcomers of each season. Some drop out on account of mourning, to take up their accustomed place in the parterre after an absence of a season or so. The Horse Show always afforded the chance which many people seem to like, and will miss this November, of observing society at close range. The observation ground will now be switched to the opera house, no doubt, where the latest word from Paris and from Fifth Avenue in evening fashions will be studied and admired at long range.

This year the name of Mrs. John Jacob Astor, widow of Col. Astor, appears among the occupants of the parterre boxes after an absence of several years. Mrs. W. Watts Sherman is also to reappear, and Mrs. Harold Brown, her sister-in-law, will also be seen in the parterre.

Mrs. James Henry Smith has Box 18 for even Mondays. Mrs. E. H. Harriman this year is to share Box 9 with Mrs. Willard Straight. Last year Mrs. Harriman had Box 11 for even Mondays. Mrs. Hamilton Fish, who had Box 9 last season for even matinées, will be seen in Box 34 this season, a box effected by the demise of the owner, James B. Haggin. Mrs. Charles H. Senff, who had Box 15 last year for matinées, will be in Box 20 this season.

It now costs about $200,000 to enter the Golden Horseshoe as a box owner. A generation ago it cost just half this much. The original investment was $30,000 for each of the thirty-five shares. Few operagoers of today can go back very far in reminiscences of grand opera in New York. The Metropolitan was the fifth theatre erected in New York for the purpose of Italian opera. In 1847 society in New York was flocking to the Astor Place Opera House, with Castle Garden and Niblo's Garden as rival houses. Five years later the house was turned over to the Mercantile Library Association, and grand opera sought a new home in the newly constructed Academy of Music at Fourteenth Street and Irving Place. Here opera reigned, and the Academy was the fashionable lyric theatre of the town for thirty years. In the Summer of 1883 the Metropolitan Opera House was built. James A. Roosevelt was the first President of the Board of Directors, and other active spirits were George Henry Warren, Luther Kountze, George G. Haven, William K. Vanderbilt, William H. Tillinghast, Adrian Iselin, Robert Goelet, Joseph W. Drexel, Edward Cooper, George N. Curtis, Levi P. Morton, and Henry G. Marquand. Thus has the artistic interest shifted from place to place. The wheels of commerce grind noisily in Astor Place, and the boom and stir of the Academy of Music, where once the diadems of social leaders glittered under the gaslights, are now filled with motion-picture "fans."

THAT the young men and women of society have carried the art of dancing to a high plane, so high that only three or four years ago it would have been thought beyond the scope of any but professional dancers, is being demonstrated now at the various entertainments where dancing holds sway. This is the natural result of a season of eternal dancing, such as last season proved to be. General dancing now seems to be more in favor than ever before, and among the younger set the fox trot is still in the lead.

The coming week is rather void of charity functions, where there is always plenty of opportunity to dance. A bazaar for the benefit of the Helpers Settlement is to be given on Wednesday in the Red Ballroom at Delmonico's, from 1 to 10 P. M. Mrs. Emile Vatable of 102 West Eighty-sixth Street is Treasurer, and the tables are to be presided over by many prominent women.

There will be a large social side to the festivities attending the sixth annual joint meetings of the American Academy of Arts and Letters, and the National Institute of Arts and Letters, which begins on Thursday. M. Brieux of the Académie Française is here to present the greetings of the 40 Immortals, whose group goes back to Cardinal de Richelieu in the seventeenth century. The President of Columbia University and Nicholas Murray Butler are to entertain on Wednesday evening at their home in connection with the meeting, and a visit is to be paid by the members and visitors to the J. Pierpont Morgan library during the week.

An attractive folder has been issued for the dance at Sherry's on Tuesday evening, Nov. 24, at 10 o'clock, to be given by the guild of the St. Timothy Alumnae for the benefit of the Children's Club of St. Ambrose, in Harlem's "Little Italy." An exhibition of the Irish dances are to be given at 11 o'clock. Miss Hope Malcolm of 116 East Sixty-third Street is looking after the sale of tickets. The Executive Committee is composed of Mrs. George Whitney, Jr., and the Misses Carol Joan Whitridge, Mildred Sawyer, Edna Biddle, Margaret La Farge, and Olivia S. Erdman are among those on the Dance Committee. Miss Marion R. Taber of 349 Lexington Avenue is selling the tickets.

For the benefit of the Virginia Day Nursery a novel entertainment of dances is to be given on Monday evening, Nov. 30, in the ballroom at the Ritz-Carlton. Miss Caroline Morgan of 521 Park Avenue is in charge of the sale of tickets. Mrs. Richard Irvin, Mrs. Henry G. Trevor, Mrs. Frank B. Keech, Mrs. H. Hobart Porter, Mrs. Samuel Sloan, and Miss Annabella S. Olyphant are among those on the Committee of Arrangements.

The Big Sisters organization is to give a dance at the Ritz-Carlton on Wednesday evening, Dec. 9, to aid their work in the Children's Court. Mrs. Charles Dana Gibson is in charge of the sale of tickets at 200 Fifth Avenue. Mrs. F. O. Beach, Mrs. W. Bourke Cockran, Mrs. C. Oliver Iselin, and Mrs. William Payne Thompson, are among the patronesses.

MRS. ANSON D. BRAMHALL announces that the opening of the Tuesday Salon is to be held at Sherry's on Tuesday afternoon, Dec. 1, at 3 o'clock. Many well-known artists will be heard during the season. A unique feature of the Salon is the seating of guests at small tables, where tea is served after the concert is over. Miss Mabel Garrison, George Dostal, Lucile Orrell, and Manfred Malkin are among those who will appear on Dec. 1.

Miss Emmy Destinn, Miss Frieda Hempel, Miss Lucrezia Bori, and Pasquale Amato are to appear at Mr. Bagby's musical mornings at the Waldorf-Astoria on Mondays in December, the first to take place on Dec. 7.

The first of Mrs. Hawkesworth's four Chansons en Crinoline will be held at the Plaza on Thursday morning, Dec. 3. Mr. Amato, Miss Bori, and Miss Felice Lyne are among those who will appear at the first of the series.

SEVERAL interesting weddings in society are scheduled for the days soon to come. One of the important weddings of this week will be that of Miss Ursula Wolcott Brown, daughter of Mr and Mrs. G. Hunter Brown, and Edmund S. Twining, Jr., of this city, which is to be celebrated at 4 o'clock on Thursday afternoon in St. Bartholomew's Church. The subsequent reception will be held at the town residence of the bride's parents, 56 East Fifty-second Street.

Plans have been completed for the wedding of Miss Estelle H. Flower, daughter of Mrs. James de Laval Flower of 40 East Sixty-second Street, and Clarence M. Chauncey, which is to be solemnized on Saturday, Dec. 5, at the home of the bride's sister, Mrs. Pierre Lorillard Barbey, at Tuxedo Park. Mrs. Barbey is to be matron of honor, and Miss Helen Ladd of Portland, Ore., is to be the only other attendant. Dr. Fellowes Davis, Jr., is to be Mr. Chauncey's best man. The ushers chosen include Dr. Clarence Fahnestock, Charles A. Fowler, André P. Pillot, Clark Potter Read, and H. Coleman Drayton. The couple will reside at 780 Madison Avenue.

Mr. and Mrs. William R. Hunter of Newport announced last week that Dec. 5 has been selected as the date of the wedding of their daughter, Miss Edith Norman Hunter, and Louis L. Lorillard, whose engagement was announced last October. The bride-elect and Mr. Lorillard represent two of the oldest families in Newport. The ceremony will be performed at Belair, the residence of the bride's parents.

A December wedding of widespread social interest, both at home and abroad, will be that of Miss Julia J. Calhoun, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John C. Calhoun, and a great-granddaughter of John C. Calhoun, the statesman, to Baron Egbert de Nagell, attaché of the legation of the Netherlands in Washington, which is to be celebrated in St. Thomas's Church on Tuesday afternoon, Dec. 8. The plans were announced last week. Mrs. Eugene E. du Pont of Wilmington, Del., and Mrs. Newell W. Tilton of this city, are to be the matrons of honor, and John C. Calhoun, 2d, a nephew of the bride, will serve as page. Jonkheer W. H. de Beaufort, Secretary of the Netherlands Legation, has been selected as best man, and the ushers will include Count de Rechteren Limburg, Eugene E. du Pont, Levitt H. Hunt, and James E., D. Adams, and John C. Calhoun, Jr., brothers of the bride. The Baron is a son of Baron and Baroness William de Nagell of Holland. The date fixed for the wedding is the forty-fourth wedding anniversary of his parents. Baroness de Nagell is to come over for the nuptials. The Baron will wear the uniform of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem. An interesting part of the ceremony, which is to be performed by the Rev. Ernest M. Stires, rector of the church, will be the singing of Henry Hughes, of the Century Opera Company.

ANNOUNCEMENTS of benefits in aid of the suffering and destitute in the European war zone continue to be made. Society has rallied splendidly to the appeals for patronage of these varied relief affairs. Many of the home charities are putting forth the plea that in the press of war relief work it is going to be very difficult to care for our own poor and dependent this Winter. But society is generous, and it is predicted that more attention will be paid to the "charity at home" functions this season than ever before.

The Russian Festival, which Miss Barbara Rutherfurd has arranged for Tuesday night, Dec. 1, promises to be a very successful affair. The proceeds are to go to the Russian war sufferers. It will be held in the ballroom at the Biltmore, and will include many interesting features. The Russian Balalaika Orchestra is to play. The interest society is showing in the festival is evidenced by the array of dinner hostesses for that evening, who will take their guests on to the festival. Some of the dinner hostesses of the evening will include Mrs. Stephen H. Olin, Mrs. William Earle Dodge, Mrs. Oliver Harriman, Mrs. Henry Clews, Mrs. Amory Carhart, Mrs. Charles H. Cosier, Mrs. Arthur Curtiss James, Mrs. Gifford A. Cochran, Mrs. Robert Bacon, Mrs. H. Fairfield Osborn, Mrs. Pembroke Jones. Tickets may be had by addressing Miss Rutherfurd, care of the Hotel Biltmore.

SOCIETY was well represented in the engagements of the week. Mr. and Mrs. William A. Hamilton of 177 East Sixty-fourth Street announced the engagement of their only daughter, Miss Emily Hope Hamilton, to Harry Livingston Kaufman of Cleveland, Ohio, son of the late Samuel R. Kaufman of Marquette, Mich. Miss Hamilton has been very popular in society since her coming out in the Winter of 1913, when she was formally introduced by Mrs. George J. Gould, her mother's cousin, in January of that year. Mr. Kaufman is well known in New York and is a brother of Louis G. Kaufman, the banker of New York and Marquette, and of Mrs. Edward N. Breitung. Miss Hamilton's only brother married Miss Elizabeth Van Heusen last January. Mr. Kaufman and his bride will make their home in Cleveland and of course will spend part of each Winter in New York.

The engagement of Miss Virginia Geddes, daughter of Mrs. Charles Paul Geddes and the late Mr. Geddes of 235 West Seventy-fifth Street, to Stephen Wilcox Pratt, son of the late Nathaniel Waterman Pratt of Brooklyn, was announced last week. Miss Geddes made her début last Winter.

The report comes from England of the engagement of Prince Jean Sapieha of the Polish house of that name to the widowed Countess of Amherst. The Prince spent two years here, and lived very quietly most of the time at the great Northern Hotel in West Fifty-seventh Street. He sailed for England about the time that the war broke out.

THE débutantes will come into their own this week. The opening of the grand opera season has long been a signal for the beginning of the activities arranged for the buds by their fond relatives and friends. There have been several interesting coming-out receptions in the country during the last fortnight, but the town gayeties will begin in earnest this week, to continue until the first of the new year. The young people will practically monopolize the early season, adding zest to things, which is so badly needed just now with everybody talking war.

On Thursday Mrs. William Burgoyne Haight of 388 Park Avenue will give a reception for her daughter, Miss Dorothy Haight, at the Plaza. Later there will be a dinner for the receiving party and an equal number of young men, which in turn is to be followed by a theatre party. Mrs. John Parkin Gifford is to give an afternoon reception on the same day at her house, 473 Washington Avenue, for her daughter, Miss Almy Gifford. On Friday night next Mr. and Mrs. Walter Damrosch are to give a dance at the Cosmopolitan Club for their daughter, Miss Gretchen Blaine Damrosch.

Among the announcements for débutante affairs during the week were the following: Mrs. George H. Macy is to give a reception on Friday afternoon, Nov. 27, at her home, 22 Riverside Drive, for her daughter, Miss Kathleen Macy, with a dinner and dance to follow. For the receiving party and extra guests. Mrs. Nathan Todd Talbot is giving a reception in Montclair, N. J., on the same day for her daughter, Miss Helen Louise Knickerbocker Porter, with a dance on the same evening at the Essex County Country Club. Mrs. Thomas H. Barber of 18 East Seventieth Street will give a tea on Nov. 26 for her niece, Miss Justine V. R. Townsend. Mrs. Starr King Walker of 128 East Thirty-eighth Street is giving a reception on the same afternoon at her home, from 4 to 6 o'clock, for her daughter, Miss Evelyn S. Walker. Miss Sylvia Hyde, daughter of Mrs. William H. Hyde of 66 East Ninety-third Street, is to be introduced at a reception to be given at her home on Nov. 28. Miss Elizabeth Clarkson, younger daughter of Mrs. Robert L. Clarkson, is to make her début on Dec. 5, at a reception to be held at the home of her sister, Mrs. Frank A. B. Washburn, 52 East Seventy-ninth Street. On Dec. 12 Mrs. John Baldwin Walker of 1 East Fifty-fourth Street is to give a dance at the Colony Club for her débutante sister, Miss Caryl Hackstaff. Mrs. Rooke Hughes Wells is giving a reception on Dec. 21 at her home, 823 Madison Avenue, for her daughter, Miss Josephine B. Wells, to be followed by a dinner.

Mrs. Henry H. Welchans of Llewellyn Park, West Orange, N. J., entertained last week for her daughter, Miss Dorothy Wehrhane. Miss Olivia M. de B. Gazsam, daughter of Mrs. Joseph M. Gazsam of Philadelphia, is to make her début here as well as in Philadelphia. Yesterday a week Miss Phyllis Brown, daughter of Col. and Mrs. Franklin Q. Brown, was introduced to society at a reception at Springhurst, the country place of her parents, at Dobbs Ferry, N. Y.

BELGIUM MAY BE INSPIRATION FOR WINTER'S NEW FASHIONS

Details of Costumes Worn by Inhabitants of Little Nation Which Has Stirred the Imagination of the World May Be Reproduced in Other Lands. Already Belgian Cap Is the Smart Thing in Millinery.

FASHION usually defeats the woman who wants to wear her clothes for a long time by changing just enough of the details to make alteration difficult and new purchases desirable. When she is satisfied to let the silhouette remain as it was, she will change the sleeve, rearrange the neckline, impose a new waistline, and the deed of destruction is done. After these features are established every woman knows that her worst work has begun. She may not mind wearing the wrong kind of skirt, but she distinctly objects to wearing the wrong kind of sleeve.

This season fashion changed so much in the matter of woman's apparel this Winter that many feel it is the best economy to discard or sell all one's possessions hanging in the closet and buy one entirely new costume, if that is all that can be afforded. This is a discouraging outlook. It was not fully seen when September opened the season and brought out the new clothes. There were rumors of change and exploitation of clothes that were startlingly different from what we had worn, but somehow no one seemed to realize how drastic the changes were and how difficult it would be for women to ignore them.

It might be extravagant to say that thousands of women bought new Autumn clothes made on the same models that had prevailed all Summer, because they would not lend ear to the fact that Paris had established a new line and that it would become a law when the season advanced. It was impossible to preach the full skirt with any effect in September, because the majority of dressmakers and shops did not offer it or advocate it, and the women themselves did not care for it. As much as we had abused the narrow skirt for four years we did not show the slightest disposition to give it up when we had a chance. We had grown accustomed to its slimness and had learned to walk within its narrow confines and we were not sure that we cared to change our silhouettes, or burden ourselves with heavy clothing.

So, while we knew that the wide skirt was the coming fashion, and while we cheerfully accepted the long, full tunic, we clung to the narrow hem and believed that it might win out. The tendency is all against it today, but alteration is easy when the narrow skirt is over-topped by a long tunic. The lower skirt may simply be dropped and the tunic slightly lengthened by a band of velvet, silk, taffeta, or fur. And of fur hems there is no end.

Very Full Skirts Next Spring?

It may be that the majority of women will never accept the wide rippling skirt introduced in the Autumn, but it is more probable that they will.

Smart black silk beaver hat, with long quill ornament, modeled on the Belgian soldier's cap.

The past has proved that every decided fashion has its own way sooner or later. It is to be earnestly hoped, however, that the American woman will continue to modify the fullness of her cloth skirts and wait until next Spring to accept the five and six yards width. At that season she can use thin material and two or three years more or less will not matter in the weight of the garment.

Satin, or whatever its equivalent by next March, looks immensely well when draped into ripping circular fullness; cloth does not. There is no reason why a woman should ignore the new fashion that calls for a full skirt merely because she does not approve of a hem that flies out with every wind of Heaven, she can reduce the fullness especially at the front and back, and give enough flare to the sides to keep her in touch with the new idea.

There is a decided tendency to hold the fullness to the sides in even the most extreme skirts, and it is probable that such a fashion will dominate the new gowns that are brought out in midwinter for the Southern exodus, which, the social folks say, is to be the heaviest ever known in America. Fashionable people do not wish to remain in the great cities after the middle of February, and delicate people do not wish to remain in the cold climates after Christmas; and as the Southern shores of Europe are virtually closed and the Egyptian shore may not be any too quiet in a few weeks, the American invasion will be omitted this year. The consequence is that thousands of folks will turn to American resorts for their recreation and health; and this will have a far-reaching influence for good in this country.

Millions of dollars that have usually been spent by the tourists in Europe will probably be spent over here. It will be several seasons before Americans of all classes and all kinds of purses will cross the ocean in hordes as they have been doing for a decade.

Can America supply her own pleasure and health resorts? Most assuredly, yes. And she can do it at less expense than in Europe, and minus the Winter trip across the ocean.

So the dressmakers are looking forward to reaping a harvest from this changed condition of affairs. They will not only make gowns for those who go South, but they will supply the Spring and Summer wardrobes of those who usually get all their clothes abroad. It is probable that Florida, Georgia, California, and South Carolina will have a bumper year in tourists.

Flounces Rather Than Pleats

Possibly we are tired of the pleated tunic, and, not quite accepting the ripping skirt, made in one line from waist to shoe top, have adopted the flounced skirt, which gives three lines stretching around the figure.

Several of the new street frocks that were made this week evidenced a strong leaning toward this style. It does make a change between the style of this Winter and last Summer, and probably that is the reason for its success. It is needless to say that every figure cannot adopt the flounced skirt; but all fashions are designed for the slim, and the stout have grown so used to this that they diet and exercise, adopt the style in defiance of their figures, or skillfully modify it into an artistic compromise. The latter is an exceedingly difficult job, as every expert and amateur knows.

Evening gowns are good looking with frilled skirts that suggest the storm and stress of 1860 and 1870; but velvet and cloth must be handled in a delicate manner if flounces are to be used. If they do not cling to the figure they are not correct, for, strange to say, extreme width is only tolerated at the hem and not over the hips and knees.

The new gowns that have been made for street wear are not as pronounced in their width at the footline as are the French models, but experts believe this is only a question of time, and that the present skirts will only serve through the rest of this season, which is not a happy outlook for those who have little money for new clothes, or little inclination to worry with them.

One can choose pleats if they are admired and if flounces are not admissible, but the one thing that cannot be chosen by the woman who has any regard for style is skirt drapery. Bunchings and loopings and panniers are finished. There are tunics, it is true, and advocated by the best houses, but they are long, not short. The skirt beneath them may be narrow, but it must be of thin material. A cloth tunic is not worn above a cloth skirt; satin or bengaline silk is substituted; and this, you see, is a change from the fashion which called for a thin tunic over a thick skirt. Even in evening gowns there is this direct change. Velvet and brocade are put over lace and tulle.

SMARTNESS AND DIGNITY COMBINED.

A bridal gown, of the conventional white satin and lace, trimmed with orange blossoms, that has all the dignity tradition demands as well as all the smartness the newest lines can give it.

It is amazing how many velvet gowns are being made; and they are not confined to the day hours. Some of the smartest women in New York are wearing night blue velvet evening gowns with tops of tulle. The material reaches by several inches further up on the figure than it has done for years. There is quite a decided return to that stately style of dress which Worth has always advocated and which can best be expressed by the word ladylike.

Everywhere one turns there is velvet to be seen. It is on the street in one-piece frocks under full coats, in coat suits cuffed and collared with immense bands of fur; in the theatre chairs in glowing red, like Burgundy, with the light shining through it; at dinner parties in white with shoulder straps of crystals; in the restaurants in sapphire blue with bodice ornaments of black and sapphire jet; at luncheons in Saxe blue with bands of skunk.

It is not easy to explain why this velvet epidemic has spread over America. There was no foreshadowing of it in the French styles shown in August, which goes to prove that we like to dress as our neighbors dress, for the day that a few smart women indulged in velvet gowns the mass followed suit. As far as the evening gowns are concerned, Worth was really responsible for the fashion. He showed some wonderful ones in London in the beginning of September, which were brought to America and exhibited among the first of the Autumn fashions.

The feeling for dark blue velvet is quite important, and it is not very well known outside of a limited circle. One finds the shops selling an unusual amount of this material and color in single and double width, and one hears the dressmakers persuading their best clients into choosing it for a décolleté gown, with the addition of any kind of harmonious jet on the bodice, or below the waistline, which is a fashion distinctly copied from the Worth models.

If one goes into any smart milliner's place one hears that the universal fashion for the black velvet hat is giving way here and there in favor of the dark blue velvet hat, made in the same shape and trimmed in the same way as the black velvet ones. The sailor shape leads in these blue hats, and the burnt ostrich has no rival in trimming. Sometimes there is a field of these ostrich flues, blowing backward from the hat like seagrass in a high wind; again there are only two placed well toward the front, nodding toward each other.

Usually the quill part is tucked under a fold of the velvet, but if not a narrow band of shiny silk watered ribbon is used with a flat bow as a finish.

And writing of hats reminds me that the new thing in millinery is the Belgian cap. Those who had any opportunity of seeing the Belgian soldiers in uniform were fascinated with the jaunty little headgear, that was flattened over one side of the head, ran to a point, and a slight peak at the crown. One of the dressmakers in New York has introduced this cap in black velvet, with a quill run straight up the back. It goes immensely well with the flat, sleek coiffure of the season.

Many of us who were in Havre during that week of storm and stress where the Belgians who were cut off from their army began to arrive in small groups in order to join the English forces who were going up the coast, felt very much inclined to snatch a cap from a Belgian and bring it home. They were the heroes of the town, these good-looking, dashing soldier men, with their splendid uniforms of dark green arabesqued with yellow bands and topped by caps without visors. It is no wonder that a clever designer quickly saw the opportunity of launching this cap in sedate black velvet among American women. Its speedy popularity proved how well it was suited to the rather roguish, quite good-looking, afraid-of-nothing type of face the American girl possesses.

There is no doubt that we will have an epidemic of Belgian styles, new and old. Callot has already sent over a gown of velvet trimmed with tiny white porcelain beads and fur, which she calls Belgian, and the Flemish peasants will surely furnish much that is colorful and pictorial in the new fashions.

Everything contributes to this domination of fashions in the near future by the country and the people who have stirred the minds and hearts and imagination of the people more than any other factor in this world war.

As one writer has said, Germany may have occupied the place where Belgium was, but its soul has escaped to all the peoples on the planet. One has a thrill of pride in even wearing a garment or a hat that goes by that name and has been suggested by that country. It is like being touched by the mantle of courage.

A Word of the High Collar.

The most amusing touch anent the high collar that the American woman is taking up is the fact that she has decided to leave a deep V-shaped wedge of her chest exposed beneath it. She saunters in the street in the coldest weather with her coat cut down almost to the top of her corset, showing a flicker of bare skin between, and her neck enveloped in a fur stock that is warm enough to do duty in the Russian trenches.

The new blouses also have high boned collars and the coats reach to the ears. Some have the Directoire collars that rise high and turn back on themselves in a straight line; others have the Consulate collar which goes straight across the back of the neck, also high and turned over and made of some brightly colored stiff silk thickly incrusted with gold or silver arabesques.

The smartest outside collar is of fur as wide as it is possible to wear it. It is made like a clown's ruff in that it rises to the chin and does not bind the neck under the chin. It fastens at the left front with a rosette of velvet ribbon, or with braid buttons and loops.

High black velvet dog collars are again in style with house blouses that are cut in a deep surplice opening in front. Clever women use these on the street under a coat so there will not be a bare expanse of neck between the chin and the coat collar. The usual rolling collar of starched white muslin that extends in a surplice effect to the bust has had its day.

SOME UP-TO-DATE FASHION HINTS

PATENT LEATHER COLLARS.

A NEW collar and cuff set is made of ratine and patent leather. There is a collar, flaring and high, of blue and white ratine, faced with black leather. The cuffs are made of the ratine faced with leather, with leather turnback portions four inches deep.

PEACOCK POPLIN.

A STRIKING gown is made of silk poplin with a blue ground on which there are peacock's feathers—the ends or eyes of the feathers, to be exact—woven in natural colors. This gown has a long, wrinkled basque made of deep blue velvet.

DURABLE BRUSSELS NET.

SOME new neck ruffs are made of Brussels net, instead of tulle. These ruffs are made just like those of tulle. The net is left with a raw, cut edge, and it is gathered or box pleated and held through the centre with a band of velvet or taffeta or satin, that sometimes ends in a bow, sometimes under an artificial rose. The Brussels net is decidedly more durable than tulle, which always loses its freshness and collapses almost to nothing in moist and rainy weather.

ARE SHAWLS TO RETURN?

AT the fashionable European resorts during the past few weeks a return of the shawl has been reported. These shawls, which are worn as evening wraps, are large squares of rich silk with an 18-inch fringe lending grace and suppleness to their folds. They are highly suggestive of Spanish mode and are especially effective when draped about the body or when worn with the Empress Eugenie gown.

PLAID SPORTS COATS.

SOME of the new silk sports coats are made in large plaids. Plain checks, too, of white with a bright color, are used. On these checked and plaid coats there are collars and cuffs of plain color. Others of plain color have collars and cuffs of checks and plaids.

CREPE DE CHINE AND LAWN.

A SMART new crêpe de chine blouse is made of white, with a trimming of yellow lawn. Narrow bands, about half an inch wide, of the lawn edge the fronts of the blouse, the cuffs and the wide collar. The same idea could be carried out with violet, pink, or blue lawn with very good effect. Such a blouse would look well with a white skirt or with a suit of a deeper shade of the color of the lawn.

JET SEQUINS.

A GREEN satin evening gown is simply made, and depends for its trimming solely on a little jacket of black net, covered with tiny jet sequins. The jacket is finished with four tassels, which are attached to the pointed sections under the arms that hang down over the hips.

Beautiful WOMEN USE

SYNOL LIQUID SOAP

"A thing of beauty is a joy forever," is an old saying. But the beauty must be cultured, nourished and preserved; otherwise it would not last forever.

Women of the stage are considered the most beautiful of their sex. They are continually cleansing and preserving their skin, shampooing and dressing their hair. They must make the best possible appearance before their audience. Their toilet articles are the finest that money can buy, especially the soap, which plays such an important part before and after each performance.

Many of the most noted stage beauties are constant users of Synol Liquid Soap, because they have found through practical experience it is the best cleanser and skin beautifier.

We have received dozens of letters from well-known actresses lauding the virtues of Synol Soap.

LOUISE DRESSER.

Miss Dresser is one of the most beautiful women on the American stage. She recently starred in "Potash and Perlmutter." She wrote us the following letter several months ago:

Messrs. Johnson & Johnson,
New Brunswick, N. J.

Gentlemen—Upon recommendation of my physician I have been using Synol Soap for the past year and have gotten so that I cannot do without it. It is a most excellent preparation for the complexion and a wonderful mouth wash. I have recommended it to all my friends as an absolute necessity.

For the sake of humanity I would suggest that you make known to the world the benefits that can be derived from this wonderful preparation.

I remain, yours very truly,
(Signed) LOUISE DRESSER.

MISS FLORENCE REED.

leading lady in "The Yellow Ticket," noted for her unsurpassed complexion, sent us the following note of praise, unsolicited, after having tried hundreds of other preparations:

Messrs. Johnson & Johnson,
New Brunswick, N. J.

Gentlemen—One cannot imagine how great a toilet necessity Synol Soap is. I have used thousands of preparations in my career, but have found Synol Soap to be incomparable for the complexion, hair, scalp and as a mouth wash.

Sincerely yours,
FLORENCE REED.

WHAT EVERY WOMAN WANTS TO KNOW

Apples Deserve the Attention of the Wise Housekeeper, for They Are Inexpensive and Have Wide Possibilities.

THE days will soon be here when apples and oranges, grape fruit, bananas, and lemons will be the only fresh fruits found in every market. To be sure, hothouse grapes are now so inexpensive that almost all of us can afford them occasionally, and for many persons other hothouse and tropical fruits are Winter possibilities. But our Winter choice of fresh fruits is always more limited than our Summer choice. And the clever cook, the wise housekeeper, ought to make double use of such fruits as we can get inexpensively.

Apples should come in for first consideration, because they are cheaper and have more possibilities than any other Winter fruit. Some seasons—and this may be one of them—really good eating apples, so called, are expensive. But apples suitable for cooking can always be inexpensively bought. Remember, however, that it pays to buy a sound apple with good flavor. For if the apple is unsound, some of it must be discarded, and if its flavor is lacking in piquancy, doubtless some of it will be left uneaten. The good fruit is always less expensive than the poor fruit.

Apple salad is now so well known that it needs little recommendation. But remember that there are many combinations of apple that are delicious as salad. Here are a few:

Waldorf salad, which calls for diced apple, broken English walnuts and chopped celery mixed with mayonnaise dressing.

Apple and nut salad or apple and celery salad, with French or mayonnaise dressing.

Apple and date salad—diced apples, shredded dates, French dressing and lettuce or endive.

Apple and orange salad, with French dressing, on lettuce.

Apple and grapefruit, with or without the addition of orange, with French dressing on lettuce leaves.

Apple, rice and bacon salad—a good luncheon salad. The broiled bacon should be minced, the apples should be diced, and the cold boiled rice should be flaky. The salad should be lightly mixed with French dressing, and served on lettuce leaves with mayonnaise.

Apples with the Meat Course.

Apples in many forms are delicious with meat. Apple sauce is the accepted accompaniment of roast pork and small apples baked with nutmeg, without skins, are also delicious with pork or with veal.

Apples fried in half-inch slices with bacon are a tempting entrée served alone, or a fitting accompaniment for many meat dishes.

Apple sauce can be served in tiny shells of pastry with roast poultry and apple fritters can be served with poultry or game. When making apple sauce to serve with meat the red skin of the apple boiled with the sauce, which should be pressed through a strainer to make it perfectly smooth when done, will give it a delightful color.

Apples for Dessert.

Compote of Apples.—Six ripe apples, one lemon, half pound loaf sugar, one and a half pints water. Select the apples of a moderate size, and cut in halves, remove the cores and rub each piece over with a little lemon. Put the water and sugar together into a lined saucepan and let them boil until they form a thickish syrup; then put in the apples with the rind of the lemon, cut thin, and the juice of the same. Let the apples simmer until tender, then take out carefully and drain on a sieve. Reduce the syrup by boiling it quickly for a few minutes. When both are cold arrange apples neatly in a glass dish, pour over the syrup and garnish with strips of candied citron.

Scotch Apple Tart—Pare, core and quarter six good-sized apples. Put them in a deep dish, cover with water, add two-thirds cup sugar, two cloves and a grating of nutmeg. Sprinkle over half cup currants, two tablespoonfuls whisky, rind of one lemon and juice of two, and about a tablespoonful of butter. Cover the top with a good pie crust and bake in a moderately quick oven one hour.

Apple Fritters—Two eggs, half pint milk, a little salt, one teaspoonful baking powder, one cup flour. Beat the eggs lightly and add milk, flour, salt, and baking powder, and beat until light. Pare, core, and slice apples across, dip the slices in the batter and fry in hot butter. Serve hot, with powdered sugar.

Apple Snow—Three large tart apples, three whites of eggs, half cup powdered sugar, half cup jelly. Stew or steam the apples, cored and quartered, but not pared, drain, and then rub them through a hair sieve. Beat the whites of the eggs stiff, add the sugar, beat again; add the apples and beat till like snow. Pile light in a glass dish; garnish with jelly or holly leaves; serve with boiled custard.

Apple Pudding—Sift two cupfuls of flour, a teaspoonful of cream of tartar, half a teaspoonful of soda and two tablespoonfuls of sugar and add a beaten egg, two tablespoonfuls of soft butter and about half a cupful of milk—enough to roll. Roll in a sheet about an inch thick and put in a pan. Cover thickly with chopped apple and bake. Serve with a rich hard sauce or a hot liquid sauce.

Apple Pie Recipes.

Citron Apple Pie.—Line a deep pie plate with rich paste. Slice tart apples and fill the crust almost full. Over the apple sprinkle half a cupful of sugar and the same measure of shredded citron. Roll a dozen bits of butter the size of a peanut meat in flour and sprinkle these over the pie and chop two tablespoonfuls of currant jelly into bits over the surface or else spread it. Cross strips of paste over this filling and bake slowly for half an hour.

Apple Custard Pie.—Have ready a deep pie plate filled with paste. Make a filling of half a cupful of sweet, rich milk, two lightly beaten eggs, and sugar to taste to each cupful of apple sauce, which should be rubbed through a wire strainer to make it smooth. Pour this filling in the shell and bake until it is the consistency of any other baked custard.

Beauty Remedies of the Dressing Table That Will Be Found Efficacious Against Wrinkles, Tan and the Like.

THIS is most emphatically the day of the beauty parlor and good grooming. However, the second is not always dependent on the first; that is, an intelligent woman with a little time at her disposal can be well groomed and yet be quite independent of the beauty parlor. Many simple remedies are offered for reducing small physical defects. Any of these remedies, properly and patiently applied, will secure results. The great difficulty is that the average woman lacks perseverance when she undertakes to remove imperfections of complexion or hair. If she goes to the beauty parlor she pays some one to be persistent when she could accomplish almost the same results by persevering work at her own toilet table. Do not imagine that spasmodic applications of remedies will secure results. It is the patient, regular application that, in due time, will bear fruit.

For Oily Skin.

Here are two lotions for an oily skin, either one of which used regularly according to directions will secure the desired results, a dry, clean skin, in three months:

Pulverized borax, one ounce; pure glycerine, two ounces; camphor water, (not spirits of camphor,) two quarts. The skin should be bathed with this lotion two or three times a day.

Rose water, six ounces: elder-flower water, two ounces; simple tincture of benzoin, half ounce; tannic acid, ten grains. Apply nightly after washing the face in hot water.

Wrinkles.

Premature wrinkles—that is, wrinkles which come from illness or from the bad habit of contorting the mouth when talking—can be reduced by bathing them with the following lotion:

Rose water, 200 grains; thick milk of almonds, 50 grains; sulphate d'lumine, 4 grams. Dissolve and filter. It is then ready for use.

Sparse Eyebrows.

Pale, sparse eyebrows and lashes make a face expressionless. They can be coaxed into a better growth by rubbing the eyebrows nightly with vaseline and applying to the roots of both the eyebrows and eyelashes a tonic made by mixing 5 grains of sulphate of quinine with 1 ounce of sweet almond oil. Apply this with a fine sable brush, which comes for the purpose.

Roughness and Tan.

When the skin has become rough and tanned from sun and winds, try this simple whitener, an oatmeal lotion: Take two tablespoonfuls of oatmeal, adding a quart of water and boil for ten minutes. Cool and strain and to the liquid add the juice of one lemon and a dessertspoonful of alcohol. Wash the face in this, or rather apply it with a cloth, not wiping it all away.

For a Brown Neck.

For the chronically brown neck one must use regularly the following lotion:

Boric acid, one drachm; distilled witchhazel, two ounces; rose water, two ounces.

Exercise the throat night and morning until it becomes moist with perspiration, wipe off the perspiration with a soft cloth dipped in warm water and apply the lotion with antiseptic gauze. After a week of this treatment, you will see a marked improvement in the color of the neck.

NEW GERMAN NATION WILL RISE ON RUINS OF PRUSSIAN MILITARISM, SAYS FRENCH EDUCATOR

M. de Lapredelle, Exchange Professor from the University of Paris to Columbia, Declares That It Will Be a Liberal Germany Ready to Work with Other Countries in the Cause of Civilization.

By Edward Marshall.

IN the American press French views of the great war's significance have been less common than British views and far less frequent than German views. Therefore this talk with M. de Lapredelle, Exchange Professor from the University of Paris to Columbia, will have especial interest.

This very distinguished Frenchman, although but 43 years old, has won high eminence in his native land, especially in the domain of international law, which is his branch at the University of Paris. Also he is Directeur de Recuel des Arbitrages Internacioneaux, he is the editor of The International Law Review in Paris, he is a member of the Committee on International Law for the French Department of Justice, he is a member of the French Committee on Aerial Navigation, he is General Secretary of the French Society of International Law, and he occupies other important posts and bears other important scholastic honors.

He is a cautious conversationalist, as might be expected of one who has so deeply delved into the most cautious of all professions, but in the mind of the thoughtful reader this should add to the value of his utterances, which, as expressed in the following columns, were carefully revised by him before going into type.

I asked M. de Lapredelle to estimate the great war's probable effect upon education.

"Of course it is too early to guess intelligently," he replied, "for the effect of the war will be dependent entirely upon the results of the war, and, while we of the Allies have no doubt of our ultimate victory, it is the fact that victory has not been won as yet by either side.

"In talking with you my impulse is to assume what I feel in my heart—the certainty of German defeat, but I must not do that, although all the letters which I get from the front and from Paris express a growing confidence in the victory of the Allies.

"But it is too early to attempt intelligent detailed propheey as to the effect of the great struggle upon the world's philosophy, or upon any other phase of its intellectual development.

"Almost certainly, however, a reaction against certain Germanic influences will be apparent after the war ends, for the world will not want ever to risk repetition of the horrors of this struggle, and it will be plain that they were the inevitable fruit of Germany's attempt at intellectual domination.

"This German assumption was due, largely, to their victory in 1870, but it went far beyond the bounds of reason, far beyond the fields in which German achievement really had established legitimate supremacy.

"The momentum of victory often has led humanity into excess. It led Germany into excessive claims of social superiority and into an excessive assumption of intellectual supremacy. Even in the eyes of others it gave Germany an unwarranted intellectual prestige.

"Really, the German is not a big thinker; he is an immensely careful thinker.

"Above everything, the German is an observer—a very diligent observer—and his mental eyes are likely to be so close to the wall that he sees only a single brick in it, wholly failing to get a comprehensive view of the whole structure.

"Germans are very careful students. They attach a vast importance to detail. I think it is not unfair to say that, with the German, the smaller, the more minute the detail, the more it interests him. The German loves to write a big book on a small subject, and, loving it, he does it well.

"But there are more exalted tasks, as, for example, the writing of big books upon big subjects, giving the world fresh visions of new and far-flung vistas. The German loves to catalogue and catalogues almost with genius; he loves to deliver long lectures upon microcosms.

"Cataloguing and the near-sightedness which may arise from intense study of the atom, to the exclusion of the collective organism, whether that collective organism be the human individual or the social mass, may render immense service to the world, but it never will be the only service necessary and, if pursued to the exclusion of all other investigations, such study is likely to produce an aggravated narrowness of vision. Narrow vision is certain to eventuate in selfishness.

"The Germans became selfish after this fashion. The present struggle is the war of selfishness against world advance.

"Innumerable, or at least many, individuals have furnished smaller parallels to the course which Germany has taken as a nation. The individual with the truly and exclusively scientific mind is likely to go too far into abstractions, built from a possible misinterpretation of minutiae.

"The ideal national intellectual development will combine both fact and theory, will join rationalism to idealism, and will be far more like that of certain nations which I shall not name than it will be like that of Germany. These nations which I shall not name have both.

"In other words it seems to be the fixed idea of the German that the German civilization is the only civilization; but it is not the thought of France or England that their civilizations are the only ones.

"This very lack of what may be defined as national egotism in France and England enables these nations to work, as Germany does not, for world science and world development—the growth of civilization as a whole.

"Germany's scientific work is for German science, she thinks of civilization only as German civilization. The world's other great nations—and may I say the world's great Latin nations especially?—internationalize their science and their civilization.

"One must be struck by the fact that Germany's critical philosophy formed the basis of her educational system and, therefore, the basis of her social system, and that it had in it the basis of the war.

"It cannot be denied, I think, that her education, as well as her politics and militarism directly pointed to this great conflict. Indeed, the industrialism, the politics, the philosophy of Germany all find their logical expression in present events.

"Haegel was the first, in the beginning of the last century, to insist upon the ideas which, already being paramount in him, quickly became paramount in his followers, serving as the basis for the development of Prussia. To him this represented all and everything; to him divinity on earth was incarcerated in the State and, therefore, the development of the State, not justice, was, in his mind, the object of all law.

"Since this beginning that has been the consistent German viewpoint, and increasingly so. The glorification of the State has included, of necessity, the sacrifice of the individual, and this has been conducted ruthlessly in Germany itself.

"Of course the State which considers it right to sacrifice the individuals of its own citizenship will be sure to consider it right to sacrifice the individuals of other nations' citizenships.

"That explains why international law never has been considered binding by the German; it explains why international law was not considered binding when Belgium stood in the path of Germany's march toward Paris.

"International law never has bound the German; it never will bind him until he changes his national psychology.

"Ihering, one of Germany's greatest theoretical jurists and a scholar in the matter of Roman law, declared, 'Right is the child of might.' He did not say exactly that right is might, but he defined it as 'the child of might.'

"That may be taken as the German keynote, for this man is of such great influence in Germany that his utterances must have an enormous effect.

"Treitschke, the historian, in his teaching in Berlin, naturally drew some of his inspiration from these two men. For him the State need consider no law save that which will promote its own expansion.

"Moral law, he holds, need not and must not stand in the way of the prosperity and growth of States, as it frequently must obstruct the prosperity and growth of individuals.

"Under this theory the State has two functions: these are, inside the country, to make law, outside the country, to make war. Germany denies the right of an extraneous law to decide upon the details of right and wrong within a country, and that is why Germany defies and even denies international law.

"If it happens that a treaty which the State has entered into later proves to be obstructive to some expansion which is thought to be a necessity of the State's destiny, that treaty may be disregarded with the full approval of Germany's national morality, although similar conduct on the part of an individual in Germany would be considered highly reprehensible.

"The State may bind itself to secure advantage, but, also, it may unbind itself to secure advantage, and this without consultation with or the approval of the other party or parties to the contract.

"This theory becomes confusing to the student reared in other nations under different educational influences. It indicates beyond contradiction that Germany feels no sense of duty toward other nations, but only an obligation to further her own interests.

"Germany has immense patriotism but no humanitarianism. Her only duty is to herself. Her national egotism can be characterized by no other word than selfishness.

"It is a curious phenomenon that at a time when humanitarianism in its broadest sense has become the keynote of all other of the great nations, it has not become at all the keynote of German civilization.

"It is impossible that such pride, such a sense of arrogant national superiority as that which marks Germany, should maintain among a democratic people; it is possible only to a very aristocratic country. What has happened is its logical outgrowth in the country which it has infected.

"In Germany this sense of national pride, of intolerance of others, even of contempt for others, has been developed until it amounts to superexcitation. It not only affects Germany's relations to other peoples, but it affects the relations of Germans to one another.

"Different classes of the German population continually exhibit it in their dealings with one another.

"It is continually illustrated in those events which have been the wonder of visiting foreigners—episodes of the contemptuous ill-treatment of subordinate German soldiers by their superiors. It goes beyond that, manifesting itself in the treatment of all civilians by the lowest soldier, and, further still, in the attitude even of the lowest civilian to all foreigners, even the highest.

"The German individual may not consider himself superior to all individuals of other nationalities, but he will be sure to consider his nation so far superior to every other that there can be no comparison between it and them. His is a peculiar arrogance. It is not at all personal; it is purely national; but none the less it is arrogance, and all arrogance is dangerous.

"A hierarchy always exists in aristocratic countries; the hierarchical idea has been developed further in Germany than elsewhere.

"This has given Germany an unfortunate impulse. If to this impulse we add that other born of all her various victories since 1866, especially those which were won while Germany was realizing Bismarck's dream of triumph 'through fire and blood'—her industrial victories, her scientific advance, her social progress—and consider the Germanic tendency toward egotism, we do not find ourselves surprised when we find, examine, and appraise exactly what we have today in Germany.

"The perversion of national sentiment into national arrogance has been the definite, although, perhaps, unrealized and unintended aim of every educational influence which has been at work in Germany since 1870. It has amounted to an unparalleled perversion of a nation's sentiment toward all the outside world.

"This war marks the crisis of this German pride.

"Germany's course throughout has borne all the ear marks of a national ego-mania. The whole German people, as a nation, not, always, perhaps, as individuals, have fallen victim to the most colossal attack of ego-mania which the world ever has known.

"Combine this ego-mania with another delusion—the entirely unjustified conclusion that Germany was the object of a world-wide persecution—and it is unnecessary to search further for the causes of the war, just as it is unnecessary to search further for reasons for the combination of practically all other Europe against Germany.

"What would German victory mean to the world, if German victory came, save the world-wide dominance of German egotism, imposed at the expense of every other people? France would not escape, England would not escape, and, I assure you, you, America, would not escape. German victory would be far more than a European disaster—it would be a world disaster.

"Of all the nations in the world perhaps the United States and France have stood most notably for the ideas of international justice. This really makes your interest in the outcome of the present war indirectly as great as ours.

"I cannot see how the people of the United States can feel otherwise than that not only their hearts but their reason demand victory for the Allies, not because of any wish for the destruction of Germany, but because of the wish for the preservation of the world.

"Indeed, it is inconceivable that victory for the Allies can mean destruction for Germany. It can mean only the destruction of German militarism, which has brought about the perversion of the German mind.

"No abler mind exists. Its release from the thralldom which has fettered it would be a vast world service, would, indeed, be a vast benefit to Germany herself. It is curious but true that I believe Germany's own salvation depends upon her absolute defeat in this great war.

"A few weeks before the war began Prof. Schucking expressed regret that Germany—that is, the German Government—should be so antagonistic to international spirit. The fact that he made this expression shows that, in spite of and beyond military Germany, the intellectual élite, the cream of the élite in Germany, has remained faithful to the traditions of the great philosopher, Kant.

"The intellectual élite—the cream of the élite—therefore may be absolved from all responsibility. Loyalty to the teachings of Kant will make it possible for the friends of humanity in all nations to join with Germany for human advancement on the basis of universal justice.

"After the victory of the Allies, a new Germany will appear; it will be a liberal Germany, willing to renounce the narrow Prussian ideals, finding again the old German ideal in its disinterested form, a Germany which will be able to join hands with other nations, to help them in taking up again the works of international civilization, which Prussian Germany herself brutally brought to an end, with insolent scorn of right—an act for which she is now paying and must pay the penalty."

QUERIES AND ANSWERS

Readers of The Times are particularly requested to read the following before sending queries to the Query Department:

This department does not pretend to be infallible. It will endeavor to answer questions sent to it by THE TIMES readers to the best of its ability.

No answers can be given regarding legal or medical matters, card problems, propriety in dress, correctness of English sentences, and values of stamps and coins, nor to questions of a trivial character or of concern only to the questioner.

To receive attention every question must bear the name and address of the person sending it. This does not necessarily mean that the name will be published when the question is answered; only the initials will be used if the questioner so desires. No attention will be paid to queries to which the name and address of the sender are not appended.

Hundreds of letters are received by this department, so that it is obviously impossible to answer all of them immediately. In many cases there must be a certain amount of unavoidable delay.

Lost Warships.

JOSE M. VILLALON.—I should like to know how many warships have been lost in the present war, also their nationalities?

DAILY READER.—Will you please advise me how many ships of war have been sunk, destroyed, or captured, belonging to Great Britain and Germany, respectively?

The following figures include losses of warships reported during the present war up to and including Nov. 12: British, 7; German, 7; French, 1; Russian, 1; Japanese, 1.

For the Poor in England.

A. B.—Is there not a committee formed to forward used clothing to the needy people of Great Britain and Ireland? If you will let me know where I can direct a box of such clothing I shall be grateful.

Apply for full information to the British Imperial Club, 108 East Thirtieth Street, New York City. The Red Cross Society will be glad to send clothing to England, but it accepts only new articles.

The "Affair Zabern."

JOSEPH FERNLUND.—Will you please explain what the "Zabern incident" was?

HENRY H. KEELER.—What is the "Zabern incident" referred to in the papers?

On Dec. 2, 1913, Lieut. Baron von Foerster, a twenty-one-year-old subaltern in the German infantry stationed in Zabern, a town in Alsace, cut a lame shoemaker over the head with his sword when a party of workmen hooted at the soldiers. The incident aroused a great deal of indignation. The Ninety-ninth Infantry was transferred from Zabern to another town, and the Lieutenant was court-martialed and sentenced to forty-three days in jail. On Jan. 10, 1914, Col. von Reuter and Lieut. Schad, who had been "officers in charge" and who were alleged to have unjustly set the military power above the civil authority in the disturbances that followed von Foerster's action, were court-martialed in Berlin. Here, however, they were acquitted, and the sentence of the young subaltern was reversed by the Court of Appeals. The incident caused a storm of discussion throughout Germany and in England and France, as it was regarded as a sweeping victory for the "mailed fist" policy in Alsace and throughout the German Empire. The court's decision was generally upheld by the German nationalist press and condemned by both Liberal and Radical papers of Germany. The Berliner Tageblatt, a representative radical newspaper, wrote: "The affair Zabern has not been ended by today's verdict. It will be heard of for a long time to come."

Prof. Hale's Telegram.

V. L. MANGUN.—I have read that you received the following telegram from William Gardner Hale: "Havre, Sept. 4.—Conventions of war signed by the United States regularly broken under conditions impossible in civilization by Germany. United States should declare war." I should be glad to know the circumstances of this cable, and your comment upon it, if any.

The cable from Dr. Hale was published, without comment or additional statement, as a small news item in THE TIMES of Sept. 5. It had been sent direct by cable to the editor. On Sept. 7 an interview with Dr. Hale, who had meanwhile gone to London, was published, in which he explained his conviction that the planting of mines in the open sea was cause for a declaration of war.

The "White Papers."

ELIZABETH H. BENNEY.—To whom does "White" refer in the so-called "White Papers"?

"White" in the "White Papers" is not the name of a person. The "White Paper" is the name given to the diplomatic correspondence of the British Department of Foreign Affairs in regard to the German position at the outbreak of the war.

Illiteracy.

R. F. K.—Please give me the percentage of illiteracy in Austria-Hungary, Italy, Russia, Germany, France, England, and Ireland.

The statistics are as follows: Austria, population over 10 years, percentage illiterate, 23.6; Hungary, population over 12 years, percentage, 40.9; Italy, population over 10 years, percentage, 48.2; France, population over 10 years, percentage, 14.1; Russia, population over 10 years, percentage, 70; Ireland, population over 10 years, percentage, 17.4; England and Wales, marriages, percentage, 1.8; German Empire, army recruits, percentage, .02; Prussia, marriages, percentage, .4; United Kingdom, army recruits, percentage, 1. These figures are given on the bases on which the percentages in the various countries are reckoned. It must be remembered, for purposes of comparison, that the national percentage of illiteracy among army recruits would not reach nearly so high a figure as it would on a basis of the entire population over 10 years. This is shown in the case of France, which reports her illiteracy statistics on bases both of population and army recruits. On the first reckoning the percentage of illiteracy in France, as quoted, is 14.1; among her army recruits only 3.3 per cent. are illiterate, while on her marriages the percentage of illiteracy is 4.1. The basis of army recruits and that of marriages are much more comparable than is either with the total population reckoning.

Old Age Pensions.

R. F. K.—Kindly inform me which country first instituted the old age pension system, and to what extent it has done away with poorhouses.

The first effort at a comprehensive national system of compulsory old age insurance, which, of course, amounts to a Government pension as far as the State subsidy goes, was made by Germany in 1889. The first straight old age pension was established by Denmark in 1891. There are several varieties of old age insurance and pension plans, and there is much difference of opinion as to their workings-out. We do not know of any evidence that old age pensions have done away with poorhouses or with poor relief. You will find a most complete discussion of the whole subject in a volume called "Social Insurance," by I. M. Rubinow, published by Henry Holt & Co. in 1913.

Indoor Tennis.

MAURICE DREYFUSS.—Would you kindly advise me whether there is any public indoor tenpis in the City of New York during the Winter months. If not are there any private institutions which have facilities for indoor tennis, and could you give me some idea of their fees?

M. S. HORTON.—Can you tell me the names of places in the city where there are indoor tennis courts open to men and women?

There are no public indoor tennis courts operated by the City of New York. THE TIMES cannot give the names, addresses, or fees of private courts in its Query Column.

Pronunciation of "Allies."

C. M. WILSON.—Would you oblige one of your readers by telling how the word "allies" should be pronounced? Is it not correct to pronounce it with a long "i," as in "flies," and with the accent on the second syllable? I have heard it pronounced like the plural of "alley."

STUDENT.—Will you kindly inform me of the correct pronunciation of the word "allies"?

The word "allies" is pronounced with the "i" long as in "flies." The accent is "preferred," according to The Century Dictionary, on the second syllable of the nouns "ally" and "allies," but emphasis on the first syllable is permissible. In the verb "ally" in all its forms, the accent must be placed on the second syllable.

The Boy Scouts.

G. M.—As a boy reader of your paper I would like to find out whether the Boy Scouts are military or not. I have heard that they are claimed to be anti-military, but I have also read that Gen. Baden-Powell offered 100,000 Boy Scouts for duty in England, and also that they have done so in France and Belgium. Which is wrong? Several other boys like myself would like to know whether the organization is military or not, and whether the training would be military.

The Boy Scouts are non-military. That is, the organization is neither military nor anti-military. Complete information as to the aims, work, and training of the Boy Scouts of America had best be obtained direct from the organization's headquarters, 200 Fifth Avenue, where personal questions about the work of the Boy Scouts can be answered.

A French Newspaper.

A CONSTANT READER.—Is any French newspaper published here in New York City?

Le Courrier des Etats Unis, a French newspaper, is published in New York City.

Melrose Abbey.

MARY M. FERRER.—Kindly state in your "Queries and Answers" column what you can about Melrose Abbey, England.

Melrose Abbey is in Roxburghshire, Scotland, in a beautiful situation between the Eildons and the Tweed. David I. of Scotland founded an abbey at Melrose in 1136. It was several times torn down and rebuilt. The present famous ruins are what is left of the abbey built largely by the gift of Robert Bruce in the fourteenth century; they are the property of the Dukes of Buccleugh, and are carefully preserved. The abbey was a cruciform building in the decorated and perpendicular styles, with pronounced French influence. Much of the nave remains, with the two transepts, the chancel and the choir, two west piers of the tower, and the sculptured roof of the east end. Sir Walter Scott has immortalized the east window in "The Lay of the Last Minstrel." The heart of Robert Bruce is buried at the high altar. Sir William Douglas, "The Knight of Liddesdale"; James, the second Earl of Douglas, and Alexander II., King of Scotland, are also buried in the abbey.

Compulsory Military Service.

M.—Will you please tell me which nation began the compulsory military service? I think it was France, but I am not sure.

Napoleon had "conscript" armies, under the famous conscription law of Gen. Jourdan in 1798, but the first nation to put the universal military service and army reserve systematically in action was Prussia, at the time of the outbreak of the war of Liberation in 1813. The system has been developed since, and in the years since 1870 every European nation except Great Britain has adopted the compulsory service system.

German Princesses.

M.—Can you give me the names of the German Princesses whom the Czar's sons married? Can you tell me an address in New York where I can get photographs of foreign buildings?

Crown Prince Friedrich Wilhelm married Duchess Cecilie of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, Prince Wilhelm Eitel Friedrich married Princess Sophie Charlotte of Oldenburg, Prince August married Princess Victoria of Schleswig-Holstein. Prince Oscar's wife is not of royal birth.

THE TIMES cannot publish addresses in its Query Column, but if you will consult the lists of photograph dealers in the classified telephone directory you will probably be able to find the information you want.

AMERICAN ACADEMY OF ARTS AND LETTERS TO RECEIVE GOOD WISHES FROM THE FAMED FRENCH "IMMORTALS"

M. Brieux, the Well-Known Dramatist, Will Extend Them at Meeting This Week—What the American Organization Is and Does.

MILDLY resentful of any pleasantry that would cite its members as "Immortals," and claiming no comparison with the old-established academies of Europe, the young American Academy of Arts and Letters is to receive the French academy's comradelike good wishes from the hands of M. Brieux this week. For although the American academy has neither the authoritative structure nor the authoritative office of the kindred bodies of Paris and Berlin, Madrid and Petrograd, the the kinship itself is there; the American academy exists for the encouragement of arts and letters in the United States, and for the furtherance of a real esprit de corps among the leaders in the country's literature and art.

It was founded a little less than ten years ago, as an association of chosen workers in letters, art, and music. Its fifty members are selected from the rolls of the National Institute of Arts and Letters. The institute and academy award each year a medal for achievement in some branch of creative art, and this year they are to establish another award for workers who are not themselves members of the academy. In acting as joint host to M. Brieux on his first visit to this country, the organizations hope to establish the precedent for the entertainment of many distinguished foreigners. The American body is by no means "another French academy"; but it is that assembly's closest kin in America.

The National Institute of Arts and Letters, from the membership of which is awarded the honor of belonging to the academy, is a body of 250 men and women who are prominent in literature, art, and music. The institute was originally a branch of the American Social Science Association, and was founded by a committee of that organization in 1898. The Social Science Association has passed out of existence by this time, and the institute members found, before that body had been established many years, that it would be advisable to organize a smaller association to do effective work in the furtherance of letters and art throughout the country. The academy was therefore chosen, in 1905, by a unique plan.

Seven representative members were selected from the institute to form the nucleus and, as it were, the jury of the younger association. These seven members, the first of an American "Academy," were William Dean Howells, Augustus Saint-Gaudens, Edmund Clarence Stedman, John La Farge, Samuel Langhorne Clemens, John Hay, and Edward MacDowell. These in turn chose eight additional members, Henry James, Charles Follen McKim, Henry Adams, Charles Eliot Norton, John Quincy Adams Ward, Thomas Raynesford Lounsbury, Theodore Roosevelt, and Thomas Bailey Aldrich. The fifteen thus chosen selected five other members of the institute, and these twenty voted upon ten other academicians. The original membership was limited to thirty, but it was immediately decided that as so many of the institute members were abroad or living at a distance from New York, a more comprehensive representation was desirable, and the number was increased to fifty.

These members now choose the new academicians to fill whatever vacancies occur. Two new members have been chosen during the last year, and their names will be announced at the meeting this week. The other charter academicians of the American body were Joseph Jefferson, John Singer Sargent, Richard Watson Gilder, Horace Howard Furness, John Bigelow, Winslow Homer, Carl Schurz, Alfred Thayer Mahan, Joel Chandler Harris, Daniel Chester French, John Burroughs, James Ford Rhodes, Edwin Austin Abbey, Horatio William Parker, and William Milligan Sloane.

Mr. Howells, the President of the academy, is the only member now living of the original seven men who created the organization. In addition to those of the first thirty who are now living, the academy's membership consists of Robert Underwood Johnson, the Secretary of the association; George Washington Cable, Andrew Dickson White, Henry van Dyke, William Crary Brownell, Basil Banneau Gildersleeve, Woodrow Wilson, Arthur Twining Hadley, Henry Cabot Lodge, F. Hopkinson Smith, Edwin Howland Blashfield, William M. Chase, Thomas Hastings, Hamilton Wright Mabie, Brander Matthews, Thomas Nelson Page, Elihu Vedder, George Edward Woodberry, Kenyon Cox, George W. Chadwick, Abbott Thayer, John Muir, Charles Francis Adams, Henry Mills Alden, George de Forest Brush, William Rutherford Mead, John White Alexander, Bliss Perry, Abbott Lawrence Lowell, James Whitcomb Riley, Nicholas Murray Butler, Paul W. Bartlett, Owen Wister, Herbert Adams, Augustus Thomas, and Timothy Cole. Mrs. Julia Ward Howe is the only woman who has been elected to the academy's membership.

For the past six years the National Institute of Arts and Letters and the academy that is the institute's offspring, have held joint annual meetings, in which addresses were made by American speakers, papers presented by American writers, and encouragement in the form of readings and concerts offered to American poets and musicians. It is one of the special features of the annual meeting here this week, as of that held in Chicago last year, that the new work of American composers will be presented at a concert under the joint auspices of the two bodies.

Last year the Chicago Symphony, under Mr. Stock's direction, presented at the institute-academy concert works by Victor Herbert, Horatio Parker, George W. Chadwick, Edgar Stillman Kelley, Arthur Foote, Mr. Stock, and Edward MacDowell. This year the concert, by the New York Symphony with Mr. Damrosch, will play for the first time compositions by Frederick A. Stock, E. S. Converse, Arthur Whiting, Charles M. Loeffler, and David Stanley Smith of Yale, who will conduct his own music.

Among the writers, musicians, and artists who have addressed the academy and institute at their joint meetings are Richard Watson Gilder, Julia Ward Howe, Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Henry van Dyke, Robert Underwood Johnson, Henry Mills Alden, Nicholas Murray Butler, Lorado Taft, Percy Mackaye, Birge Harrison, Brander Matthews, Carroll Beckwith, Kenyon Cox, Thomas Hastings, William Gillette, Reginald de Koven, John Burroughs, Samuel McChord Crothers, and George W. Chadwick. The medal offered jointly each year by the two associations is open to all American artists, musicians and litterateurs, while the new award to be inaugurated this year is to be an occasional prize for exceptional achievement to which members of the academy itself are not eligible. The awards of the gold medal have been made to Augustus Saint-Gaudens for sculpture, James Ford Rhodes for history, James Whitcomb Riley for poetry, William Rutherford Mead for architecture, and Augustus Thomas for the drama. This year's medal is to be given to a distinguished American painter.

Robert Underwood Johnson, Secretary of the Academy, sums it up as a movement with a national and patriotic aim in literature and the arts.

"Within the limitations of numbers, the aim is to contribute something to better fendencies and larger sympathies in letters and arts," he said. "It is without personal, partisan, or sectional bias. Its meetings have been held with a view to encouraging esprit de corps among the various professions, and its proceedings are largely occupied with setting forth conditions of work in the United States and suggesting needed improvements. The academy takes particular care not to be a 'self-chosen' body, and to be free from all objectionable sense of that phrase. Its members are chosen, so to speak, by their peers, from the recruiting ground of the institute, which was in its turn chosen by a committee.

"Especial interest attaches of course to the entertainment of M. Eugene Brieux at the joint meeting. M. Brieux, in addition to speaking to us on the theatre as the instrument of social progress, will bring to the young academy the honor of cordial greetings from the oldest and most notable of such bodies—the Académie Française. We hope to have other distinguished guests from time to time, and the Chancellor, Prof. Sloane, will have some interesting announcements to make concerning the future plans of the academy."

The National Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which the academy is an outgrowth if not actually a part, is a like organization, five times as large as the small body. Its aim, to quote its constitution, is "the advancement of art, music, and literature," and its President is Dr. Brander Matthews. The Vice Presidents are Arthur Whiting, Hamlin Garland, Robert Underwood Johnson, Hamilton Wright Mabie, Harrison S. Morris, and Jesse Lynch Williams, and its Secretary is Henry D. Sedgwick. As Mr. Johnson points out, the existence of the two organizations and the honor of their membership aims, "so far as any distinction in membership is concerned, to offer a double stimulus to good work to artists of all kinds in America."

FINE POINTS FOR THE WOULD-BE EXPERT IN AUCTION BRIDGE

By Florence Irwin.

FROM far away across the sea there came to me this question: "What do you think the opening bid should be on these two hands?

♠ K Q J 9 8
◇ 1 7 6
♣ Q 2

and

♠ K Q J 8 7
◇ K Q 8
♣ Q 7 3

"During a recent sitting my partner dealt himself both hands on the same rubber, and on each occasion bid 'one no-trump,' in my own opinion a quite indefensible declaration. What do you say?"

Those two hands that look so similar are as different as night and day. I cannot imagine any one bidding no-trump on the first; I cannot imagine any one failing to bid no-trump on the second unless, indeed, the score was such that one or two odd, in clubs, would put him out. Then he should choose the club declaration in preference. But never on a clean score.

The very first test of a no-trumper is this: Has it more than one unguarded suit? If it has that is absolutely the end of your no-trumper. And, by the same token, it is the end of the first hand just given. Both diamonds and spades are unguarded. The hand must, therefore, be opened with "a club."

The second hand stands the test; it has but one unguarded suit—hearts. If hearts are bid against the hand the no-trumper is killed, unless the partner of the no-trump declarant holds a heart-stopper. If he does hold such a stopper and a trick or two besides he will raise the no-trump bid. If he does not, the no-trumper is dead, but the heart-declarant has, at least, been pushed to "two" instead of getting his bid at one.

To come back to our second hand, it stands the first test of holding but one unguarded suit. Its spades are but slightly guarded, I admit, and it has no established suit. But it holds some beautiful sequences—the diamond-stopper, being a sequence-stopper, is invulnerable. It is sure to take the first, or the second, round of diamonds, or even both, (provided the diamond ace lies on its right.) A high sequence-stopper is invaluable.

The clubs are neat and compact. When the ace is gone the chances are that they will all be good. I should far rather hold those clubs than a scattered open suit that ran to the ace.

Then use the "average" test; if a hand is protected in three suits and is an "average" hand, it is a standard no-trumper, not a "possible" one, but a "standard" one. And an "average" hand holds these cards, (or their equivalents:) One ace, one king, one queen, one jack, &c. Two kings and two queens may be considered the "equivalent" of one ace, one king, and one queen.

Our hand is shy of aces, but it holds in their places two kings, three queens, and a jack. Two kings and three queens are certainly the equivalent of one ace, one king, and one queen.

The days of demanding aces for no-trumpers are over. Aces are good and I prefer to hold them. But I can declare no-trumps without them.

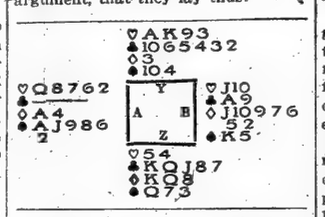
In old bridge there were but two ways of scoring the magnificent sum of 100—going rubber and holding four aces. This being so, we never risked an aceless no-trumper from the fear of finding 100 aces with an adversary. Such a holding would equalize even the rubber value. There were no fifties in the bridge of the past, and no 250.

Today there are countless hundreds, countless fifties, and the rubber value has jumped. So, relieved of our fears of 100 adverse aces, we bid aceless no-trumpers.

Therefore the hand under discussion is a standard opening no-trumper. Its lack of aces is no bar. It is protected in three suits. It stands the average test.

And so I wrote to my correspondent. I did not say it was an invulnerable no-trumper. I did not say that the ultimate declaration must necessarily be no-trumps. I said that "the correct opening declaration was one no-trump unless the score were well along." And so it is.

Back came the answer thus: "I do not remember how the remainder of the cards lay in the hand under discussion, but suppose, for the sake of argument, that they lay thus:



"Suppose Z bid his no-trump and every one passed. Suppose A led his fourth best spade and B took it. Suppose B said to himself: 'I can lead the spades back at any time; I'll just lead now from the top of my diamond sequence.' Then what about your no-trumper?"

Now, really, that is a little too much. Suppose the cards did lie in that position, and Z did open with a no-trump, don't you all know that A would bid "two royals"? Of course he would. What man, holding six spades headed by ace-jack, a blank suit, and ace-small in another suit, would pass an adverse "one no-trump"? It is rarely profitable to defeat a one-bid. To pass those royals in the present instance would be to throw "game in the hand." No "A" in the world would do it.

A would certainly bid—but we will grant that he doesn't. Y must. And that is where the beauty of it comes in. There is no getting around the fact that Y is absolutely obliged to overcall with "two clubs." And everything is all right.

The no-trumpers of the day are made possible only by the rules for overcalls. Any player who hears his partner open with "a no-trump," hears the next man pass, and sees himself with a hand that menaces no-trumps, must overcall with a two-bid in any suit in which he holds "five cards to an honor, or six cards to anything." Y, seeing himself with a six-card suit headed by an honor and with a side-singleton, would be absolutely obliged to overcall with "two clubs."

I pass over A's "pass" when he holds an excellent bid; I pass over B's forced return lead of a diamond when his only possible lead would be the five of spades; I pass over anything that either or both of the adversaries may, or may not, do or say. But the most elementary player in Y's place would see his duty and would do it. And we breathe again: The country is saved.

Take away Y's long clubs that form his club overcall and you must give him hearts enough to make a corking heart overcall, diamonds enough to shorten B's diamonds, or spades enough to make his ten a stopper. Of course, you might subtract two clubs and fill their places with one diamond and one spade, but then you etiher block the spade-suit in B's hand or shorten it in A's, and you certainly shorten the adverse diamonds. And that is the worst you can do if you sit down and think all day.

That was a made hand, specially designed to defeat Z-Y, and it failed to do it. Because no matter what A did, Y's duty was clear.

Take a normal hand under average conditions; let the bidding be fair and let the adversaries do what they would honestly do, instead of having them pass perfectly splendid makes. Grant a partner who knows his overcalls. Make the adversaries play fairly, as they would in a closed hand, and see how often you will come to grief on that no-trumper. Even in the few cases when it would fall (if there could be such cases) it would not fall badly. Certainly no more than other standard bids frequently fail.

I have offered to answer any other situation in which the bid can be imagined.

I have seen a trick-hand in which a man holds six hearts with all the honors, and good side-suit, and is defeated. I think he is defeated at "one heart," if I remember rightly. But that hand proves nothing. It was made by straining; it wouldn't happen once in a thousand years. And the man who held it had an excellent heart-bid whether he was defeated or not.

Now, I like this discussion. Nothing appeals to me more than a good fight, as my nullo-record will prove. But I want the conditions to be fair.

Speaking of nullos, the first thing that amazed me about them was their spread and growth. What now astounds and delights me is to see the grasp on them the average player is acquiring. We play them constantly, no longer with groanings. We play them, of course, in perfect silence, but not heavily nor laboriously, nor so slowly that it hurts. The cards fall as rapidly, the hand runs as fast, as in the old suits. Mistakes are rare, defeats infrequent and slight. The day has at last come when the average player "sees into" nullos as clearly as he sees into the rest of the game.

Deliver me from nulloless auction! Where I used to sit and say "no" and "no" all evening I am now in the thick of the fray, all the time. Where I used to see contracts going at one or two I now see everything forced to the interesting point. I see players using all their wits to decide how high they dare bid, bidding to the utmost limit of safety, and then playing for all they are worth. I see no more flat and uninteresting hands. I see no nullo-prejudice, no nullo-nervousness, and but little remaining nullo-idiocy. I win habitually, and nearly always heavily, though that, of course, is the thing that matters least. Long live nullos!

I hope next week to write on the test-hands of several weeks back. And I hope soon, thereafter, to write of auction-strategy. As a great general sees infinite strategic possibilities where a lesser mind would perceive but the obvious, so does a great player outgeneral a smaller one. I have saved some intensely interesting situations from recent games for your benefit. After a dinner comes auction, and after auction (and the return home) come the silent vigils when I write my notes on the actual plays in actual hands, so that my readers may receive practical rather than theoretical instruction.

Caruso's Sketch of Himself as Don Jose in "Carmen"

The Opening of the Opera Season—What Is and Is Not Coming—Aubry's Record.

IT is Mr. Gatti-Casazza's generalship that has enabled the Metropolitan Opera Company to begin its season tomorrow evening exactly as intended and planned long ago and with only the absence of one member of the company, Mr. Dinh Gilly.

Mr. Gatti-Casazza had to extract his artists from all sorts of predicaments in most of the warring nations. Diplomatic machinery was set in motion; and was more successful in the service of art than in averting war. It is understood, and is said with dire mysteriousness, that wires had to be pulled leading to the very highest places. Some of the missing were bearing arms at the front, others were in foreign prisons. Not only the rescue of such was necessary, but also the all-important and often-difficult problem of transportation had to be solved. And in all these things how successful Mr. Gatti-Casazza has been the result has shown.

It was, indeed, announced at one time that the season would open with Umberto Giordano's new opera, "Madame Sans-Gêne"; but managers and the public have long ago learned not to put too much reliance on the promises of composers touching their uncompleted works; and "Madame Sans-Gêne," apparently, for the present remains uncompleted. Probably public and managers alike will suppress whatever disappointment they may feel at having for the present to dispense with Giordano's new opera and will gain consolation from other offerings.

As to Giordano, whose opera was to open the season but will not, it may be said that he has not filled a very large place in the operatic record of the last few years in New York, nor have his operas made an incontestable record of success. The Metropolitan has never produced one of them. The last one heard here was his "Andrea Chenier," which Mr. Oscar Hammerstein somewhat unaccountably gave in one sole performance in the season of 1907-08, as a compliment to Mr. Campanini and his wife. In the same season he produced Giordano's "Siberia" as a part of his regular repertory, but in only three performances.

Other promises of new things, or of revivals of half-forgotten old ones, in the impending season are interesting. And as Mr. Gatti-Casazza has had in recent years a way of keeping his promises concerning such matters, more than usual attention will be given them. Borodin's "Prince Igor" is one of the expected novelties, for which the way was evidently prepared by the success of Moussorgsky's "Boris Godunoff." It is a Russian opera of the same school, Borodin being, with Moussorgsky, one of the "big five" who claimed the title of Russian composers and the credit of establishing a truly Russian art based upon purely Russian elements. "Prince Igor" has been one of the very successful productions of the Russian opera company at the Drury Lane Theatre in London in the last two seasons that set the "advanced" London public so by the ears.

Weber's "Euryanthe" will interest deeply students of the German opera, for Wagner confessed to so great an influence from it upon himself. It is little known to the present generation of operagoers. It has not been heard in New York since the German opera season of 1887-88 at the Metropolitan. To all intents and purposes, says Mr. Krehbiel in his "Chapters of Opera," it was new to the American stage when it was produced there on Dec. 23, 1887. Twenty-four years before there had been some representations of the opera, under the direction of Carl Anschütz, at Wallack's Theatre, at Broadway and Broome Street. It had only four performances at the Metropolitan, and has not been heard in New York since "Fidelio" is also to be revived, after five seasons of absence from the stage of the Metropolitan, and a little one-act opera, Franco Leoni's "L'Oracolo," is to be produced. It is not an ambitious list of "novelties" and "revivals."

For the first time in several years the announcement of a native American opera is not seen in the prospectus; nor is the sound of English destined to be heard upon the stage. No statement as to the management's views about opera by Americans has been made; but it would probably not be very difficult to divine what those views are. A good deal of money and a great deal of time and skill have been spent on this commodity. The results have, frankly, not been greatly pleasing to the people who pay to witness the productions of the Metropolitan Opera House. Nor have easily traceable results been obtained in stimulating and encouraging a school of American composers. Some may say that more perseverance, a longer trial, a more extensive opportunity, would alone have such results; that an American school is not to be full fledged in two or three years, but that a longer encouragement is needed. The managers of the Metropolitan, however, are not to be greatly censured for looking gloomily upon a plan of action that costs them dearly and does not please their subscribers, to whom they are under more immediate obligations. So far as the success of the coming season is concerned, it will doubtless not be injured by the absence from it of an American opera.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

May I point out to you that, by your review in THE NEW YORK TIMES of an English translation of F. Aubry's "Trouvères et Troubadours," you continue to bear testimony to a lie. Aubry was a damned rascal who stole all his ideas in regard to the technique of mediaeval French music from another Frenchman, Jean Beck, who had allowed him to read the manuscript of his own work, which showed his methods and results. Beck made the charge of plagiarism against Aubry, and his charges were fully confirmed by a committee—appointed, I believe, by the French Academy—by the members of which Aubry was denounced as a common thief. Owing to his premature death, so great an emphasis was not laid on his crime as would have been under other conditions. It is too bad that a translation of a plagiarism should tend to give credit where it is not due, and it is for you musical critics to correct the mistakes made by publishers and their penny-a-liner translators. For details in regard to the plagiarism you can easily go to the chief source, Jean Beck, who has been for some years in this country, and is now at Bryn Mawr College, Pennsylvania.

GEORGE L. HAMILTON.
Cornell University, Ithaca, N. Y., Nov. 8, 1914.

The statement is extravagant, the language intemperate and excessive. We doubt if unprejudiced persons familiar with the incident would consider M. Aubry to have been either "a damned rascal" or "a common thief." It is, furthermore, certain that M. Aubry did not steal "all" his ideas in regard to the technique of mediaeval French music. The controversy centred about the interpretation of one particular period and one particular kind of mediaeval French music, that of the trouvères and the troubadours. Aubry did a great amount of work on other historical subjects in music that is held in the highest esteem by his colleagues, scholars of all nationalities.

Beck having charged Aubry with appropriating his results, a committee of musical scholars to whom the matter was referred decided against Aubry, as our correspondent states. Aubry, though he complained that no member of it was competent in special knowledge to pass on his work, issued a second edition of his book, "Trouvères et Troubadours," a popular treatment of the subject, in which he inserts the following note: "This second edition has enabled me to correct certain errors and modify passages which appeared to undervalue the achievements of my colleague, M. Jean Beck." In passages in the book he gives credit to Beck, and also questions his views on various points.

But it is clear that some of M. Aubry's colleagues, scholars intimately familiar with his work and best able to judge of it, do not agree with the committee of musicians who decided against him. Thus, one of the most distinguished, Johannes Wolf, a German, wrote that Aubry never needed to stretch his hand out to seize another's property and was morally not capable of doing such a thing. Cases where two investigators have obtained similar results at the same time are not rare in the records of science; and the suspicions raised against Aubry are, in this scholar's opinion, unworthy of him. Certain French scholars, too, refused to believe in Aubry's rascality, as Jules Combarieu, Romain Rolland, and others. It is unquestionable that his own undoubted achievements in musical archaeology have made him a name not to be forgotten.

The roster of the Metropolitan Opera Company this season includes eleven new names — three sopranos, one mezzo-soprano, three tenors, two baritones, and two basses. An important newcomer among the sopranos is Mme. Melanie Kurt, who will not arrive until the new year. Mme. Kurt for the past six years has been the leading dramatic soprano of the Royal Opera House in Berlin. She will be heard here in all the Wagnerian rôles suited to her voice. Her reputation in Germany is of the first order.

Mme. Elisabeth Schumann is a young German lyric soprano who replaces Mme. Bella Alten. She is a native of Thuringen and studied singing at Dresden with Henisch and at Berlin with Dietrich. There she has remained ever since. Her répertoire includes Gretel, Micaela, Zerlina, Musetta, Cherubino, and Eva. She made her début in 1909 at Hamburg as Sophie in "Der Rosenkavalier."

Mabel Garrison is an American girl and a native of Baltimore, where she studied at the Peabody Institute. She has a coloratura voice. Before her engagement by the Metropolitan Opera Company she had the experience of several years in English opera companies.

Mme. Raymonde Delaunois, the new mezzo-soprano, is a native of Mons, Belgium. Since the war began she has heard nothing of her mother, grandmother, or her two uncles who brought her up since her father's death in her early youth. Her husband, Mr. Thomas, is just recovering from a wound which he received while fighting in the French Army near Soissons. Mr. Gatti-Casazza heard of Mme. Delaunois while she was singing in Germany, where for some seasons past she has been a popular favorite. She has a large mezzo-soprano répertoire.

Johannes Sembach, a young German tenor, made a deep impression on the French critics last Spring at the performances of "Parsifal" and "Die Meistersinger" at the Théâtre des Champs Elysées in Paris. He is in his early thirties, and has a good stage presence. For several years past he has been singing in Dresden. His répertoire includes all the Wagnerian tenor rôles.

Lucca Botta is a young Italian lyric tenor, who has been on the stage only four years. Amalfi is his native place. He studied at Naples with Caruso's old teacher, Vergine, who since has died. He made his début at the Mercandante Theatre, Naples, where Caruso also made his début, in "Cavalleria Rusticana." Conductor Mancinelli chose him to create the tenor rôle in his opera "Ero e Leandro" at its first performance in Barcelona. He sang last season in Buenos Aires and at the Scala, Milan.

Max Bloch is a new German light tenor, who sings such rôles as Mime and David.

Riccardo Teganni is an Italian baritone, who is known in Italy, Spain, and South America. His répertoire includes not only all the Italian but also the best-known French rôles.

Silvio Burkenroad is an American baritone, who was engaged at the end of last season.

Arthur Middleton and Albert Pellaton are both American basses. Mr. Middleton comes from Iowa, and began his musical career as director of the glee club at Simpson College, Indianola.

BORWICK
WHAT THE CRITICS SAID:
W. J. Henderson, N. Y. Sun, Nov. 6th:
"This is a pianist who ought to grow in general favor and whose concerts ought to command the attention not only of the connoisseurs of piano playing, but of music lovers in general."
H. E. Krehbiel, Tribune, Nov. 6th:
"In a noble sense he was academic in Bach, Beethoven and Scarlatti; but he showed the Brahms poetic fibre in the sonata—strength, sincerity, tenderness. He may not be a player for school-girls; he is for men and women."
Richard Aldrich, N. Y. Times, Nov. 6th:
"Mr. Borwick appeared again yesterday at Carnegie Hall and showed that he is a pianist of the highest accomplishment, an artist of singular individuality, gifted with poetic vision, but essentially sound and wholesome in all that he does."
Pitt Sanborn, Eve. Globe, Nov. 6th:
"Mr. Borwick's main offering was the Brahms sonata in F minor, and his performance of the work was one of the finest achievements by any pianist heard here in recent years."

Second Thoughts on First Nights

"The Miracle Man," Rewritten and Revisited—"The Only Girl"—Mr. Yost—Mr. Dickens in the Movies.

THE long recognized tendency more and more to cultivate interest in the play at the expense of the player is rooted in the nature of the modern play and is by no means confined to professors of the drama and to those who write pieces for magazines and papers. The matinée idol is almost as extinct as the Dodo, and even the casual and easily pleased theatregoer can often be overheard in the intermissions audibly reconstructing the play. As a playwright and producer the great Mr. Cohan not only has a bigger audience but a bigger hold on the popular imagination than he ever had as a dancer and an actor.

When it was announced that he was to dramatize Frank L. Packard's widely read magazine story, there was much speculation as to how he would go about it, and scarcely had the final curtain fallen on the first night at the Astor, when every one, probably, from the critics to the call boy, began busily planning alterations. Since then hundreds have doubtless been engaged in mentally rewriting "The Miracle Man." This is interesting to note in the light of the fact that in that interval it actually has been rewritten by Mr. Cohan himself. A conspicuous and significant change was made in the play about a fortnight ago. "The Miracle Man" now on view at the Astor is a different and rather a better play than the one produced there two months back.

Those familiar with the story and the steadily increasing number of people familiar with the play know that it concerns a band of New York swindlers who try to exploit an old village faith healer for the lining of their own dirty pockets, and who, before their trick is turned, witness his greatest miracle in the regeneration of their own souls. As Mr. Packard told the story and Mr. Cohan wrote the play, the gang came to an intolerable dilemma, facing a choice between continuing the deceit or cruelly hurting the Patriarch by full confession. The release and the third act climax came with the Patriarch's sudden death. Had they been children in his hands? Had he known all along? They wondered. Mr. Cohan did not say. Now he does say, and the Patriarch himself lives to tell the tale.

This twist to the play, though it necessitated little alteration of the text, and that apparently only in the last quarter, can be felt throughout the entire length. It adds substance and increases somewhat the dramatic force of the story at the slight cost of bringing the Patriarch on again. This is a character so much more effective in the wings than in the spotlight that it was at least a question whether he might not better have been kept off the stage altogether, but the character is at once more potent and more feasible for stage purposes in the present version of "The Miracle Man."

"The Miracle Man" is worth going to see. It is by no means a subject for unqualified enthusiasm, but there is much that is sound and good and entertaining in Mr. Cohan's play, as written and as played. It is not easy to see how complaint can be made on the score of lack of insight. After all there is nothing in the subject or the story that, of necessity, calls for a more searching study than is here made, for the matter of faith in human thought provides at once a solution and evasion of the questions of philosophy, and can be handled in play or story either by one whose penetration goes to the depths of the human soul or by one who sees and describes but the surface of things.

The climax of the second act of "The Miracle Man" is one of the most genuinely tingling dramatic moments felt in the American theatre in recent seasons. It is thoroughly fine. And much of the playing is of the sort to cause rejoicing. James C. Marlowe is capital. So is Earle Browne. Frank Bacon's work has been applauded in this column before. Ada Gilman is hereby applauded. Percy Helton gives a beautiful performance as the little cripple and the credit of the play's big scene is partly his. And you may journey from one end of Broadway to the other without seeing a simpler and lovelier bit of playing than that done by Gerrie O'Brien as Mary Holmes in "The Miracle Man."

OCCASIONALLY it so happens that several plays come to town at the same hour, and it is not always possible to meet them all. And even when it is, the arrival of any one of them is likely to lose the distinction of being an event. Such an evening of many openings was the Monday before election, when the delightful Marie Tempest arrived at one theatre, and that very fine artist, Elsie Ferguson, arrived at another, while several old New Amsterdam favorites came back to Forty-second Street to the tune of Ivan Caryll. As if they were not enough, Joe Weber, producer, slipped into the Thirty-ninth Street Theatre, and hung up a sign to the effect that within there was to be seen, at so much a seat, an entertainment prepared by Henry Blossom and Victor Herbert from a play by Frank Mandel. Now everybody is telling everybody else not to miss seeing "The Only Girl."

Not because it is remarkable, for it is not remarkable. On the contrary, though carefully staged and skillfully done, it is most unpretentious. It is equipped with pretty, tripping music, but Mr. Herbert has done that before. Not many have done it better and precious few have done it oftener. It is amusing, but musical comedies are as likely to be as not—just about. The charm of "The Only Girl" lies in the fact that at every point it insists on getting out of step with that interminable line of entertainments called musical comedies and designed by those whose consuming passion, apparently, is to see that their work shall not differ in any conspicuous way from all the rest. What we get are variety shows, but of only one variety. The librettists will have their little joke, and sometimes you have been led to wonder wildly why they do not get a new one. But "The Only Girl" is deliberately different, and therefore delightful. It is funny. So, by the way, is Ernest Torrence, who plays Andrew McMurray in it, and who is as Scotch as Bunty. It is pretty. It is clean. It is liked. It is farce, interrupted from time to time by songs, and in providing these Mr. Herbert has achieved the distinction of writing a dozen, with every one of them eminently whistleable.

Now "The Only Girl" is moving from the Thirty-ninth Street to the Lyric. Mr. Weber thinks he has a treasure, and he wants room for it. There will be more room in the orchestra pit for the brasses needed for Mr. Herbert's score and more room in the orchestra chairs for Mr. Weber's paying guests, of whom it is to be hoped, there will be thousands upon thousands.

IT was on another night of many openings that a farce called "Overnight" stole into town four years ago, and after remaining lost in the shuffle for a little while, caught the public fancy and stayed and stayed. It not only served to introduce Philip Bartholomae to New York, but it brought suddenly to Broadway's errant attention the exceptional talents of a young actor named Herbert Yost. These won quick and warm recognition for a player who had been chiefly known before that for his stock company work in Boston. Mr. Yost scored in terms of New York favor, yet he departed when the farce did and was heard of hereabouts no more. There were tidings from time to time to the effect that he was "working in the movies," a way that actors have these days. And then last Tuesday evening, when that delectable playhouse, the Punch & Judy, was opened for its first performance, there was Mr. Yost again, playing an entirely different part in an entirely different way, and playing it so well there could be no doubt that for him the American première of "The Marriage of Columbine" was a brilliant personal success. If those who saw his farce agonies in "Overnight" guessed that he was an actor of fine ability, they were quite right. If this be a stock company which Charles Hopkins has launched at the Punch & Judy, then Mr. Yost and Mrs. Hopkins (the Violet Vivian of many Ben Greet performances) are two members whose work in the first play of the season is of the sort to whet the appetite for the next one.

The interior of this midget playhouse, with its dark, beamed ceiling, its curious boxes, its long, pewlike stalls, its great candles, its remarkable Charterhouse attendants with playbills tucked in their belts, its inviting lobby, and its prints and paintings, would alone justify a visit to the Punch & Judy. Everything—except the play—shows such a nice judgment, and the general air of distinction and high endeavor gave edge to the amusing "overheard in the lobby" remark of one first-night wag, who said:

"All that is lacking to make this evening complete and perfect is to have Winthrop Ames come down the aisle and hiss."

BY the time these words are readable, "The Highway of Life," will have started its tour across the East River from Wallack's to the Montauk Theatre, thus ending the brief Broadway career of the unhappily launched but charmingly atmospheric dramatization of "David Copperfield." It was heralded on its arrival as the first dramatization of the book to be seen in New York for half a century, which may have been an oversight of the fact that it was seen here within half a year on the motion picture screen. And if, despite the warnings of experience, there is to be an insistence on transplanting the long, intermittent, ramifying narrative instead of merely the people and the color, then the movie is really the simplest solution, just as it is the simplest solution of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," of which the film version is the best stage form there is.

Dickens, by the way, is no stranger to the movies and, thanks to an undesignated clipping which came in a recent mail, it is possible to record here some one's mild protest against the film version of Edwin Drood," where, in the lake dragging scene, a taxicab was seen trundling by in the middle distance.

"Does this not constitute newly discovered evidence," is the question gravely asked, "and might it not be considered a point in Jasper's favor?"

THE FIRST NIGHT CALENDAR.

"THE BIG IDEA," a play in four acts by A. E. Thomas and Clayton Hamilton. At the Hudson Theatre Monday night.

"UNE FEMME PASSA," a play by Romain Coolus. To be played in French by the French Drama Society at the Century Lyceum Monday night.

"WALLENSTEIN," by Schiller. By the German stock company at the Irving Place Theatre Wednesday night.

"WHAT IT MEANS TO A WOMAN," a play in four acts by E. H. Gould and F. Whitehouse. At the Longacre Theatre Thursday night.

"THE GARDEN OF PARADISE," a spectacular dramatization of Hans Christian Andersen's "The Little Mermaid," by Edward Sheldon. At the Park Theatre Friday night.

PRINCESS THEATRE—Three new plays commencing Saturday night.

THE coming week in the theatres offers plenty of variety even if the quantity of plays to be put forward does not come up to the standard set by other weeks. Cohan and Harris, who have been something more than remarkably successful in this remarkably poor season, are sponsors for a new drama; the French Drama Society begins its season of plays in French; the German actors at the Irving Place Theatre will present another play; two women writers have combined in writing a play which comes into the Longacre Theatre; Edward Sheldon's long expected and much talked of dramatization of Hans Christian Andersen's fairy tale, "The Little Mermaid," which in dramatic form is to be known as "The Garden of Paradise," makes its bow, and three new plays move into the Princess Theatre. The new offerings are well distributed through the week.

The new Cohan and Harris offering, which those managers will present, together with Charles Gilmore, is "The Big Idea," which comes to the Hudson Theatre tomorrow night. It is only meagrely described by the producers as an unusual play from the pens of A. E. Thomas and Clayton Hamilton. The cast includes Ernest Glendinning, Richard Sterling, William Courtleigh, Forest Robinson, Harold Russell, George Wright, Jr., Harrold Grau, Desmond Kelley, Isabel Garrison, Hazel Lowry, and Frances Wright.

The French Drama Society opens its season at the Century Lyceum tomorrow night with "Une Femme Passa" by Roman Coolus.

The society's season will last ten weeks, a different play being given each week. In addition to these modern plays there will also be a series of special Friday matinées designed to be attractive to schools. At those matinées plays which have become classics will be given, each play being preceded by a short lecture.

Lucien L. Bonheur, the President of the society, has succeeded in getting together a group of artists likely to give a very good account of themselves. The society's membership is limited to 400 and nearly that number of subscriptions have already been received.

The first production staged this season by Director Rudolf Christians of the German Irving Place Theatre will be given Wednesday night, when Mr. Christians will present Schiller's "Wallenstein's Lager," the prelude of the famous Wallenstein Trilogie. "Die Piccolomini" and "Wallenstein's Tod" will follow in quick succession. With "Wallenstein's Lager" will be given "Kurnacker und Piccarde," a little play of the war of 1870. Mr. Christians returned from Germany a few days ago He brought along twelve new artists to reinforce his stock company.

Thursday night will find "What it Means to a Woman," a new modern play in four acts, housed in the Longacre Theatre. The principle rôle will be played by Rita Jolivet, who heads the cast including Frank Mills, Joseph Kilgour, Laura Nelson Hall, Alice John, Catharine Calhoun, Jean Newcombe, Juliet Shelby, Marion Lord, Florence St. Leonard, Royden Keith, Arthur Hyman and others.

"The Garden of Paradise" will be seen at the Park Theatre Friday night. The story of the play follows closely Hans Christian Andersen's story of "The Little Mermaid." The lines are Edward Sheldon's poetic transcript of the fanciful Danish author's fairy tale.

The cast includes Littiedale Power, Jessie Villars, Minnie Terry, Phyllis Thatcher, Emily Stevens, Lionel Braham, Sheridan Block, Harman B. Cheshire, Murray Kinnell, John Rogers, Asheton Tonge, Clarence Felter, Maud Hildyard, George Relph, W. W. Gear, Frank Conroy, A. L. Barrett, Bennett Kilpack, Hugh McCrae, Maurice Robinson, Richard Hale, Clifford Walker, Renee Kelly, Rosina Henley, Rosalie Mathieu, Agnes Dorntee, Eva Michener, Hazel Turney, and Euphemia Fowler.

An augmented orchestra, under the direction of Nahan Franko, will play the incidental music for "The Garden of Paradise," written by Arthur Farwell.

The new programme at the Princess Theatre on Saturday evening will comprise but three one-act plays. Two of these, "Nettle," a comedy by George Ade, and "The Fog," a drama by Frederick Truesdell, have already been announced. The third is said by Holbrook Blinn to be the most ambitious offering of the petite playhouse. It is a one-act play, in four scenes, by B. M. Dix—"Across the Border." The four scenes will be presented without any lowering of the curtain, and the play will consume about one hour. It will require a larger cast than has been seen in a Princess play before, utilizing fourteen principals. Mr. Blinn has a rôle unique in his wide répertoire, and a young Englishman of considerable London note, David Powell, will have an important part. The author of "Across the Border" was coauthor of "The Road to Yesterday" and "The Breed of the Treshams."

Mme. Labadie's Dramatic Reading.

Mme. Labadie, the dramatic reader, will present Henry Arthur Jones's play, "Michael and His Lost Angel," at the Little Theatre Tuesday afternoon.

'TWELFTH NIGHT' NEXT WEEK

Miss Neilson-Terry to Open at the Liberty.

Owing to previous contracts made by the Liebler Company for the début of Phyllis Neilson-Terry at the Liberty Theatre beginning Monday, Nov. 23, Mrs. Patrick Campbell in "Pygmalion" will be obliged to move that week to Wallack's Theatre.

Miss Neilson-Terry will be seen during her first American season in a répertoire of classic plays. She will make her début at the Liberty Theatre in the character of Viola in "Twelfth Night," which she played with Sir Herbert Tree as Malvolio at His Majesty's Theatre, London.

Miss Terry will be surrounded by a cast including Henry E. Dixey as Malvolio, Eben Plympton as Sir Toby Belch, Lawson Butt (who succeeded Lewis Waller in "The Garden of Allah") as Orsino, and Miss Jessie Busley as Maria. The rest of the cast include Miss Edith Campbell Walker as Olivia, Edgar Kent as Fabian, James Berry as Antonio, Cecil Cameron as Feste, Walter R. Creighton as Sir Andrew Aguecheek, Reginald Goode as Sebastian, Roy Cochran, William Giffard, Reynolds Evans, Maxwell Ryder, Claude Stevens, and Frederick Guest.

THE CHORUS GIRLS' REVIEW OF WILLARD MACK'S PLAY

He Records, Among Other Things, All He Heard Them Say About "Kick In" Before He Took to His Heels.

By Willard Mack.

Mr. Mack is an actor-playwright, and "Kick In," a highly entertaining crook melodrama, is the first sample of his work submitted to New York. It opened some weeks back at the Longacre Theatre, and tomorrow evening it moves down to the Republic Theatre.

IN writing an article describing my own personal views upon my play "Kick In," now being presented by A. H. Woods at the Republic, I should preface all further remarks by saying:

"I think it's a very neat little bit of drama."

There is nothing very original in that, is there? Most authors think along the same lines the great difficulty being to have Mr. and Mrs. Audience share your viewpoint.

So many people, upon meeting me for the first time, seem disappointed in not seeing me in a sweater, the idea being, I presume, that the man who writes "rough stuff" must have had rather a hard education somewhere, somehow, some time, and that, such being the case, the result of aforementioned education must have bequeathed to said recipient some thumb-prints of the past, like the cauliflower ear on the pugilist. And I dare say such deductions are very human.

My desire to glean information concerning the denizens of thiefdom began to accrue at an early age. There was something always terribly fascinating to me about a murder trial, and no matter what the evidence presented against the accused, I always found myself making excuses for the criminal and hoping he would be acquitted, which I know you will readily grant was not a normal condition. So, with many shadowgraphs of the past constantly flitting across my memory, my rather sympathetic outbreak began to take form in the manner of writing about those things which it seemed I cared most to analyze. In other words, since it was denied me to become a lawyer, (my own fault, by the way,) and rise up before the jury in my majestic wrath, I decided I would create cases of my own imagination, try the cases myself on paper, acting as judge, jury, and the entire display of legal fireworks. And so without more ado I wrote "crook stuff," and there you are.

But I have strayed from my objective point, that of criticising my own play. After having said that I shall plead guilty to the charge of having written a bully good play, (this boy hates himself,) I should prefer to sidestep the issue and tell you of a partial review of "Kick In" I overheard the other evening while seated behind two chorus girls who were viewing the play. When the curtain dropped upon the first act this is what drifted my way:

Gracie—Lemme see your menu card, I dropped mine on the floor, and with this new straight jacket on—well.

(Gracie hands over her programme.)

Gracie—I told you that was Josie Victor playing that Myrtle dame. She ain't changed a bit since she was with the "Pink Lady."

Estelle—What are you talking about, she wasn't with the "Pink Lady."

Gracie—She wasn't—I am crazy I guess? Why I dressed right next to her for a season.

Estelle—Why, you poor nut, that was Josephine Smith.

Gracie—Was it? Oh, yes, so it was, the names are so much alike.

(A fat man across the aisle sneezes and I hold my breath.)

Estelle—How do you like the play?

Gracie—Well, I'll tell you, Stell, I am very strong for the first fitting, stick around, and I'll tell you later.

Estelle—What did we see that Big Bill in last year—that Gillespie fellow?

Gracie—"Grump," wasn't it?

Estelle—My Gawd, no—that was Eddie Foy.

Gracie—Oh yes, so it was.

Estelle—I have seen him somewhere, he always plays scoundrels.

Gracie—Barrymore's lovely, ain't he?

Estelle—Oh, he's always good—he looks just like them ads for Arrow collars.

Gracie—(To man stepping on her feet as he resumes seat) There's some people come to the theatre that ought to be in trenches. They could do more damage, maybe—

Estelle—Ssh, the rag is raising!

(Curtain ascends; both ladies seem much interested during act.)

Gracie, (after the second act) Ugh, the dirty little saphead, he had the rocks all the time.

Estelle—What do you think of him? He's a nice-looking little mutt, ain't he?

Gracie—Yes; but he's certainly using his sister rotten.

Estelle—And then so good to him, too.

Gracie—Oh, well, he can be nice when he wants to. I saw him in that other show, you know, "The Family Chest."

Estelle—No, not chest, refrigerator.

Gracie—"The Family Refrigerator"! Marie, my sunshade! What are you talking about?

Estelle—Well, it was something about something to eat.

Man in Front—Excuse me, ladies, "The Family Cupboard."

Both Girls—Thank you very much.

Gracie—I think it's a dandy show. Who wrote it?

Estelle—Why, Willard Mack.

Gracie—You don't mean that actor that was out in Salt Lake City so long? For the love of Mike, did he? Why, I knew him when—

(Author hastily leaves at this point.)

CURTAIN.

HOW ELEANOR PAINTER STARTED

THERE are a good many reasons why a trip to the Forty-fourth Street Theatre is worth while just now, and probably the best of these reasons is Eleanor Painter. It is she who sings the title rôle in "The Lilac Domino."

Miss Painter is an American soprano with a German training. She is slim, dark, pretty, and as graceful a prima donna as you would find in many and many a moon. Also, she most decidedly can sing. And her years are twenty-five.

Miss Painter can tell a very interesting story of hard work, of hopes aroused and deferred, of her start here in New York when she sang as contralto soloist in a church, of her arrival in Germany with the prospect of acquiring her musical education on an allowance of only $50 a month, and of the hours of reward when Strauss himself played an accompaniment for her, and when, finally, she came to sing opera in Berlin.

But none of these stories is quite so interesting as the one that shows how it all began and how she first got the notion that she could sing. This happened when she was 15. The place was a road in Colorado Springs. The girl, who had been shipped out there for her health from her home in Omaha, was riding on a bronco pony and singing a popular air as she rode, when she was stopped on the road by two women, who asked her name and if she would like to study singing.

Now it happened that one of these women was Mme. Esperanza Garrigue, a New York vocal teacher, and she and her sister, Alice Mott, started Eleanor Painter on her studies. She studied for a year in Colorado, and then, with some funds raised for her benefit, she journeyed to New York to climb the next rungs of the ladder. Berlin came later and finally Andreas Dippel and the prima donna rôle in "The Lilac Domino."

New Dancer for "Suzi."

Miss Raynelle Morris, a young American dancer, who played for three seasons at the Royal Theatre, Budapest, and who arrived from Europe Wednesday, has joined the "Suzi" company at the Casino, and will give a solo Hungarian dance in the third act of that operetta at the Casino, beginning tomorrow night.

"UNDER COVER" FOR BLIND.

Special Matinee for the Sightless at Cort Theatre.

There will be a special matinee of "Under Cover" at the Cort Theatre on the afternoon of December 3, given exclusively for blind persons. The details are in the hands of Mr. Holmes of the Matilda Ziegler Magazine for the Blind.

The acceptance of the invitations will give "Under Cover" on this occasion a remarkable audience of at least 1,500 persons, the capacity of the theatre. The general public will not be admitted and the performance will be strictly for the blind. The programs will be printed in the raised point system, which can be easily read by blind folks.

A printed synopsis of the events occurring in each act will be read to the sightless audience before the curtain rises. Such matters as the turning of a key in the door, the tampering with a lock in the desk and the dropping of a tobacco pouch containing pearls, and other business in the play, will be accentuated in order that the significance of the action may not fail to be conveyed to those who can hear but not see. The characters in the play will be described to the sightless before they appear.

A special matinee for the blind was given of "Within the Law" some two years ago, which attracted attention the world over, but on this occasion the players did not appear in costume, it being supposed that the "blind audience" would not sense the difference. It was learned afterwards that not a few of the sightless ones realized this and they expressed regret that they could not "see" Miss Cowl's gowns.

A MOLIERE BREADTH IN "MY LADY'S DRESS"

By Frank Vernon.

Mr. Vernon is the man under whose direction "My Lady's Dress," Edward Knoblauch's latest play, was staged both at the Playhouse, where it has been playing for several weeks and at the Royalty Theatre in London, where, after an enormously successful run of many months, it has just given way to a revival of Mr. Knoblauch's equally distinguished work, "Milestones."

THERE may be a thousand different and effective ways of performing the plays of Shakespeare. Each school of acting creates its own particular method of presenting the works of the greatest of all dramatic poets. Between the early rhetorical style of a few generations ago and the present, subdued, impressionist form of giving expression, there have been many attempts at beautifying the beautiful, each one of which has reflected the age in which it has been put into use. Every so-called Shakespearean school of acting has found a following in various periods and countries, but today Shakespearean tradition is a by-word among the intellectual, something to be despised and derided by the truly "cultured." Away in the corner of every theatre, far behind the critic of modern taste, there sits in solitude the one of whose censure Shakespeare bade us beware. May it not be conceivable that, to him, modern art, with its undoubted influence upon the stage of today, has robbed the author of "Hamlet" of one of his greatest charms—that of simplicity?

If from the shades of the past we had to call forth the shade of the one most worthy of paying homage to the memory of the founder of the drama of the English-speaking world, no past master of English writing would be so eligible for that proud distinction as a Frenchman who was almost Shakespeare's contemporary. Jean Baptiste Molière could place the crown on Sheakespeare's head. Then truly genius would approach genius.

And yet for those who gained the knowledge of these representative writers through the medium of the stage itself how differently time has served them both! For the one, modernity has excluded tradition. For the other, it has voted that tradition forms much of the charm of representation. Through the centuries certain formula for the playing of Molière has been handed down from generation to generation of playgoers until it has reached the stage of the present-day Comédie-Française. In the French theatre Molière is given now as he was first given in the mid-seventeenth century. Even in this realistic age of the theatre, not one jot of the charm of artificiality has been taken from Molière; all that has been well guarded by the subsidized theatre of France whose Directors and public demand that Molière plays shall be given the true Molière spirit now and for always.

The artificial manners of the seventeenth century must be set forth in an artificial form. Can one imagine "L'Ecole des Femmes" being played in modern conversational tones? Yet how refreshing it is to have one's imagination stimulated in this realistic age by a visit to any French theatre upon a Molière night. One seems to take a jump from one extreme to another.

In miniature form New York audiences are today taking this jump from realism to artificiality, for at The Playhouse the principal female character in "My Lady's Dress," played by Miss Mary Boland, dreams herself back in Molière surroundings. For the making of the lace of the dress her mind wanders back to 1660, in Holland, the very time when Molière was writing his most successful comedies in Paris.

The representation of this scene is presented with the real Molière tradition. Mr. Leon Quartermaine represents a super-splendid Louis XIV. dude, and all the characters of this episode of the play are performed with that light-hearted naïveté and simplicity which chronicles the spirit of that period. The writing of that scene, the method of production, the music and the scenery itself might have been lifted bodily from a scene from any play by the author of "Le Malade Imaginaire." Contrast is the strongest feature of Edward Knoblauch's very human piece of work, "My Lady's Dress," but here is contrast with a vengeance.

In this lightest of light comedy one does not notice that the audience is being addressed directly by the actors, that every movement is extremely artificial, or that the performers are walking the stage with a very assumed grace. One almost expects a liveried servant to walk across the stage and snuff the floats, which in modern parlance are called footlights. Then before "My Lady's Dress" is taken back to the present age of grace and realism, even as far back as a sordid room in the East End of modern London, the actors of this particular scene bow low and courtsey as a sign that they still are "His Majesty's Servants"; one cares little that Louis XIV. is dead, for the much-despised tradition has worked its charm and has taken us back to an age when tradition meant much to the manners of mankind, the manners of men and women for whom that merry comedy writer, Molière, wrote his gems of comedy.

MINUTE VISITS IN THE WINGS

JOHN MASON has departed with "Big Jim Garrity" from the realm of dollar melodrama, and though the farewell night of the engagement came unexpectedly early, it was enlivened by several mishaps which made it one of considerable gayety. The trouble began in the first act, when, as the burly ex-convict, Mr. Mason strode to the fireplace and, in the Sherlock Holmes fashion, reached for the poker to bend across his biceps just to show how terribly strong he was. One was waiting for him with a soft metal in the middle to make the trick simple. By accident he picked up the shovel instead, and the audience was rejoiced by the spectacle of his vainly trying to bend that bit of iron out of shape.

The second mishap came in the third act, when Big Jim, tied to a swivel chair, had to tweak a revolver from the table by twitching the cloth, catch it in falling, and shoot the villain down while the lamp fell from the villain's hands. It was disastrous when the revolver fell all the way to the floor that last evening, and in bending forward to reach it Mr. Mason broke the chair and pitched forward with the seat and back attached to him in the fashion of an unbecoming bustle. As he was still bound he could not get up, and there was that villain at liberty, still enlightening the world with the uplifted lamp, patiently waiting to be shot. There was a dreadful pause, and then, in the wings, a bright prompter fired a pistol. The villain fell. So did the curtain—to tumultuous applause.

WILLIAM ELLIOTT, who has his name in electric lights now as a manager and actor, might have blazed forth on Broadway in an entirely different sort of a sign if his father had been allowed to control his destinies. "Painless Elliott" might have been the way the sign would have read, for the senior Elliott intended that his son should become a dentist. "I went to the Harvard Dental School," said William himself the other night in his dressing room at the Booth Theatre, where he is playing in "Experience," "and maybe I would have made a pretty good tooth-puller had I stuck to the thing, but somehow my tastes didn't run in that direction, and I struck out for the stage. Before I was 20 I was the leading man in the Boston Juvenile Minstrels, and I played the banjo, violin, and tambourine, and in the afterpiece did a merry wench. Quite a long jump, that, to some of the parts I have played since, but every time my father saw me act he insisted that a corking good dentist had been spoiled by the stage."

AUGUSTUS PITOU, Senior, the author of "Jack's Romance," in which Fiske O'Hara is starring, began his theatrical career in this city as a member of Edwin Booth's company, and is the only survivor of the famous organization that dedicated Booth's Theatre at Sixth Avenue and Twenty-third Street. "I remember the event well," said the veteran actor-manager-author yesterday. "The opening bill was 'Romeo and Juliet,' with Mr. Booth as Romeo and Mary McVicker as Juliet. I headed the theatre programme as the Prince of Verona, and so greatly did I resemble Mr. Booth that at my first entrance I was given a tremendous ovation that was, of course, intended for the tragedian. The cheers and applause continued for several minutes, and I was scared almost to death. Mr. Booth stood in the wings laughing. He told me not to speak, 'Wait until it's all over,' he said. I waited, and when Mr. Booth came on the audience realized its mistake and gave him a tumultuous ovation. Since that season I have devoted my time to management and playwriting. I managed the late William J. Scanlan many years, and at his death became Chauncey Olcott's manager, and for eighteen seasons directed his tours and wrote several of his plays."

WALKER WHITESIDE'S YESTERDAYS

NEW YORKERS know Walker Whiteside largely by virtue of his work in three plays—"The Melting Pot," "The Typhoon," and "Mr. Wu," his current stellar vehicle. Little do they know of the years of his youth when, as a boy just out of high school, he toured the great Middle West in a repertory of plays which ranged from Shakespeare's dramas to pieces of his own writing.

A list of the plays in which Walker Whiteside has starred is a formidable one. While in his teens he decided that he would be a star, and began his starring tour forthwith—in "Hamlet," of all plays. He was successful, and presently revisited the small cities in his particular territory in "The Merchant of Venice," which was in turn followed by "Othello" and "Romeo and Juliet." Twice in his early career did he visit New York. The first time he appeared at the old Union Square Theatre, where he was billed as playing Hamlet at Hamlet's age. The critics were kind, but the paying public stayed at home. Several years later Whiteside again essayed a round of Shakespearean dramas—this time at the Herald Square Theatre. The same result as before—so back to the West he went and resumed his career among his followers, who loved him and went to see him every year, for his annual visits were among the dramatic events of the season in those regions.

In the seasons dating back ten years before "The Melting Pot" was brought out in New York Walker Whiteside appeared in the aforesaid Shakespearean dramas and the following plays as well: "Eugene Aram," "Cousin of the King," "The Man in Black," "The Red Cockade," "Robert of Sicily," "Heart and Sword," "We Are King," "The Magic Melody," "Richelieu," "Lady of Lyons," "David Garrick," "Jewels of Fire," and "Richard III." Two of these plays were written by Mr. Whiteside himself, "We Are King" and "The Magic Melody," in both of which he starred with success. In connection with "Richard III.," it may be mentioned that he played him as a young man, just back from France, a dandy of the courts of that country, and not, as he is usually depicted, with a shrunken leg and a humped back. This version brought forth a storm of adverse criticism, but Whiteside clung to this portrayal.

As an indication of the esteem in which Walker Whiteside is held in the territory that knows him most intimately, Whiteside's friends like to tell this story. While on tour in "The Typhoon" last Winter, his friends in Fargo, N. D., learned that he was playing in Winnipeg. Over the long-distance telephone overtures were made to him to visit the little city and play in the armory at the State Agricultural College, the regular theatre having been destroyed by fire. Whites.de's route was rearranged and Fargo was visited. The college auditorium is three miles out of town, but the huge building was jammed to the doors. The students had erected a temporary stage, special electric cables had been in place and the school orchestra supplied the music.

NOTES WRITTEN ON THE SCREEN

STRAND THEATRE:—"Aristocracy."

VITAGRAPH THEATRE.—"Two Women" and "The Little Angel of Canyon Creek."

BROADWAY ROSE GARDENS.—"Life's Shop Window."

VAN DYKE BROOKE, one of the directors of the Vitagraph Company, wanted an experienced actor to play the part of a minister; a bit, but important enough to call for the services of one familiar with the requirements of such a part. As all of the regular stock members were engaged, Mr. Brooke sent a hurry call among the extra people, and was immediately besieged with applicants. Selecting one who might look the part if properly made up, he asked:

"Are you an actor?"

"I have been on the nine-foot line," was the response.

"Next!" yelled Mr. Brooke.

Several aspirants passed in review before him, exhibiting their good points, but none seemed to satisfy the director until a long, lean, hungry-looking individual made application.

"Are you an actor?" asked Mr. Brooke.

"Well! I have a dress suit," was the reply, in a sepulchral voice.

The director gave the assembled extras one withering look and vanished.

At the Strand Theatre Tyrone Power will make his initial appearance on the screen in Bronson Howard's dramatic success, "Aristocracy." The subject was produced by the Famous Players Film Company, and Mr. Power has been given an exceptionally well-balanced and important supporting cast, including Marguerite Skirvin, Edna Mayo, Arthur Hoops, Ida Waterman and William Rosell.

Claire Whitney, the heroine in the William Fox production of "Life's Shop Window," will personally appear at the Broadway Rose Gardens Theatre tomorrow evening as an added attraction in conjunction with the exhibition of the picture which will continue its run at this photoplay house indefinitely. Her lecture in connection with the picture will consist of an explanation of her difficulty in interpreting the rôle delineated by the author. Apart from these special features the Shubert picture production of "The Wishing Ring," with Vivian Martin, will also be shown.

Edward Abeles, star of "Brewster's Millions," "Charlie's Aunt," and a long list of other stage successes, has been engaged by the Famous Players Film Company to appear in a film version of Henry W. Savage's comedy production "The Million." This production will be the second offering to the motion-picture public by Mr. Savage, in affiliation with the Famous Players. Edward Abeles will play the rôle of the Baron in "The Million."

Miss Annette Mark and Max Spiegel will be married in Buffalo next Wednesday. Immediately after the ceremony the bridal couple will leave on an extended trip through the West Indies and the Canal Zone. Miss Mark is the daughter of Mitchel H. Mark, President of the Mark Strand Theatre Company, owners of the Strand Theatre in this city, and Mr. Spiegel is Treasurer of the corporation.

METROPOLITAN CAN'T STOP JOE WEBER'S UPWARD RUSH

Grand Opera No Obstacle to Little Manager When He Gets Ready to Make a Change in Theatres For "The Only Girl."

THE only trouble about moving 'The Only Girl' from the Thirty-ninth Street Theatre to the Lyric on Monday night," said Lee Shubert to Joe Weber, "is that it conflicts with the opening of the Metropolitan Opera House."

"That's so," replied Mr. Weber, "but it can't be helped. I'm afraid we can't begin, in a perilous season like this, to look out for the troubles of the Metropolitan."

And that's Joe Weber from tip to toe—not so very much in actual inches, to be sure, but considerable when measured in terms of aggressiveness. Nothing stands in his way when he gets ready to make a move in the theatrical business, which may account for the fact that Broadway believes he enjoys an income on a million dollars.

Mr. Weber is not often in the limelight these days, and the theatre-going public remembers him only as the smallest one of the old music hall pair. Perhaps it is the realization that he would "get a laugh" still out of respect to the old days, which keeps him in the background. That, incidentally, recalls a story on just that point.

John Daly Murphy, an actor whose reputation has been made as a comedian, was out of a job some years ago. A big racing melodrama was being rehearsed and the managers wanted an actor to play the part of a serious jockey. Murphy went after the part and impressed the producer, but the latter was afraid that Murphy was too funny to be cast for a serious rôle.

"I can play it, all right," said the actor. "I've been playing in stock out in Milwaukee, and if you don't think I can play anything just telegraph Sherman Brown at the theatre out there and see what he says."

"I'll do it," said the manager. "I'll leave it to Brown, and whatever he says goes."

And so the following telegram was sent to Milwaukee:

"What about John Daly Murphy, is he a good actor?"

In a little while back came the answer:

"Murphy great. Sure to get a laugh on his entrance without speaking a line."

And so, in order to avoid "getting a laugh on his entrance," Joe Weber never makes one these days. He keeps very much in the background all of the time, but despite these laugh-making abilities his thoughts theatrical are really quite serious and aimed at better things in the drama.

"The Only Girl," which has just been produced by Mr. Weber and which is moving tomorrow night to the Lyric Theatre in order to accommodate larger audiences, is a fair sample of what he is trying to do as a manager. Most people who remember Weber as a slapstick comedian would imagine that his ideas of musical comedies would be of the typical Broadway variety, with rows and rows of girls, and all that sort of thing. "The Only Girl" itself dispels that notion.

It was Joe Weber who brought over the Welsh Players a season or so ago, and when they scored an artistic triumph but failed to attract many dollars to the box office, he was just as happy as though their play had settled down for a long and prosperous run. And Weber is gratefully remembered as the producer of "The Climax."

Mr. Weber is through with acting. He says so himself, and he means to keep his word. He has had nearly thirty years of it on the stage, and he considers that quite enough. Perhaps the fact that he is distinctly in funds makes it easier for him to stay retired. At all events he is through acting.

And while he is ambitious to produce good things on the stage, Mr. Weber has no thought of becoming a producer on a large scale. One or two shows is about all he cares to look after at a time, and if they are bringing in the money he considers it quite sufficient.

It was way back in 1877 that Weber went on the stage with Lew Fields as a partner down on the Bowery. Nearly ten years later they were running their own music hall, and now it has been ten years since they first split up and went their different ways. Once since then they were reunited, but somehow the old team didn't pull together as they had done before and the new partnership did not last very long.

American Music at Little Theatre.

The recent offer of Winthrop Ames to play new, original, unpublished American music exclusively during the intermissions at his Little Theatre has been productive of gratifying results. Many manuscripts had to be returned because they did not conform to the conditions given, but a surprisingly large number were admitted into the eligible class. The first set to be selected came from Arthur Foote, the well-known composer. The inspiration was a quatrain in the Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam. Emilie Frances Bower, musical critic, is the composer of the second set selected. She will have two pieces on the programme at an early date.

Elmendorf's Second Travel Talk.

The second illustrated lecture in Dwight Elmendorf's new cycle of travel talks will take place at Carnegie Hall tonight, when the artist and lecturer will visualize a trip "Around the Mediterranean." Starting at Tangier with its mediaeval Orientalism, the tour is continued to Algiers, thence to Tunis, Philippeville, Carthage and Port Said, where a detour is made into Egypt. After a visit to Cairo, the Sphinx, and the pyramids, and glimpses of Luxor, Memphis and Karnak, a short sojourn in the Holy Land will follow before the return journey along the opposite shore is begun. This travel talk will be repeated tomorrow afternoon.

"Larry" Marston, veteran stage manager and motion picture director, is violently opposed to noise. Noise of all sorts, from the roar of Krupp siege guns to the chirping of crickets in new mown hay, is anathema to him. Particularly is he opposed to the blare and clap-trap of the "legitimate" stage. "Give me the projection room of a motion picture studio with only the distant and subdued whirring of the film in the magazines to break the silence," says Mr. Marston. "Give me a discreet operator, no subtitles to break in and disturb the illusion of the animated scenes unrolled before my eyes, and, with cotton in both ears, I really can enjoy myself. I take pleasure in the peaceful quiet of a church; at times to be alone on an Oklahoma ranch forty miles from the nearest railroad with nothing but the sighing of the prairie grass to disturb one is even more enjoyable, but the tomb-like stillness of a projection room is preferable to both. Most actors act better than they talk. That is why I prefer to see them on the screen. When actors are working before the camera I prefer to have them keep silent. If move their lips they must, I'd rather that it be done inaudibly. With 75-millimeter guns punctuating the silence of European fields and compressed air drills vying with pneumatic hammers all over New York, I wish to make an appeal for quiet, for silence, tranquility, stillness; in short, for a nihility of noise."

NO MORE ELECTION BULLETINS

JOHN B. FITZPATRICK, manager of the Hippodrome, has an idea that election returns will be barred from that big show house on all future election days or nights. During the late election a telegraph ticker rattled and clattered in the office of the Hippodrome while a trained newspaper man "boiled down" the mass of facts and figures to brief, condensed bulletins, which were conveyed to Mr. Fitzpatrick, who read them at intervals from the orchestra pit. Governors were bowled out of office and new men elevated to that honor, Senators rose and fell, the victories and defeats of great political parties were recited, but without arousing any indication of interest on the part of the audience. Finally the idea burst upon Fitzpatrick's mind that the assemblage had come to witness the spectacle "Wars of the World" instead of a political educational lecture, so he decided upon a crucial test.

"Ladies and gentlemen, here is a bulletin of unusual interest," he thundered. "William Burke of Catarangus County, author of 'Fixing the Furnace,' has been elected Game Warden by a plurality of 14 over Oscar Spiffens."

The members of the orchestra nearly fell off their seats, but there was neither shock, surprise nor amusement in the audience. It was just as apathetic as when the bulletin was read announcing the Penrose victory in Pennsylvania—it simply paid no attention to either!

"That settles it," said Fitzpatrick. "I suspected it all the time, but didn't have the nerve to accept the fact. Boys, cut out that telegraph service!"

MARBLE-TOP TABLES BOON FOR PROMOTERS

Irvin Cobb Suggests Way to Keep German Waiters from Destroying Many Valuable Schemes.

IRVIN COBB has just returned from Europe, where for three months he has been paging the news of battle, murder, and sudden death. Despite the grimness of what he has seen and had to chronicle, Cobb's humanly humorous point of view is no wise in eclipse.

Shortly after he got back to New York he dropped into the Reliance-Mutual plant, where "Our Mutual Girl" serial is produced. Cobb has been photographed several times with Norma Phillips, heroine of the serial, and just before he went to Europe wrote four chapters of the story. Miss Phillips now becomes sponsor for the following yarn of one of Cobb's many adventures:

When he was in Aix-la-Chapelle, whither the Germans had taken him as a non-paying guest so that he might learn just what was happening in Brussels and Ghent and Ostend, Cobb spent his rather long evenings at café tables quizzing German wounded or Belgian refugees. He noticed that all the cafés had marble-topped tables and that these tops usually were covered with figures. Cobb asked a Herr Lieutenant what it all was about.

"Every American who has been here two hours has a plan for making a fortune out of this war," Cobb's informant said. "These plans are flexible. They can be compressed or extended to suit the amount of capital possessed by the person who is the American's auditor. It all swings on how the industries of Germany, somewhat hampered by the war, can be developed."

"How do you mean?" queried Cobb.

"If you have as much as $2 cash you will be told to buy a hive of bees. The next day the bees will swarm, and then you will have two. Your bees will visit your neighbor's, and when the visits are returned you can corral the strangers, and you soon will have four swarms. On this progression you will have 800 swarms in a year or so, and every swarm will yield a net profit of $5 a year."

"And then what happens?"

"Well, if you have $500 you can go into the chicken business, and then you will have an income of $8,000 a year, and an investment of $8,000 will put you in right in the sugar-beet business. It is figures and figurings leading up to these totals that you see on these table tops."

Thereupon Cobb took out a pencil and began figuring on his own account. After a minute he exclaimed, "I've got it! There's a fortune in it!"

"Permit me," said his English-speaking German friend, who confessed to having lived ten years in New York, "to call your attention to a famous American remark, 'That's what they all say!'"

"No, really I've got it. Now you listen to me." And Cobb, his pencil hovering in the foreground, explained his plan:

"These marble tops," he said, "always are chilly. Just as your victim is nearly landed he puts his arms on the table tops and gets a chill. The chill is communicated to his feet. The result is that your scheme fails. Now, my plan is to have these table tops made of a composition that will not be as cold as marble and will have no foot-cooling effect when the arms rest on it."

"I see you have caught the spirit of Aix-la-Chapelle," said the Herr Lieutenant. "But I neglected to tell you that about the time your fortune is made along comes a waiter with a damp towel and wipes out your figures, your fortune, and your warm arm-rests."

Was Cobb stumped? Not at all. He asked:

"What'll they fine a man for killing the waiter before he uses his damp towel?"

HAS NEW PLAN FOR STAGE LIGHTS

A NEW device to control the light effects on stages, the invention of a Boston man, is on exhibition at 714 Fifth Avenue, in connection with the display of the art of the theatre. This invention, which the inventor says promises to revolutionize the lighting of stages, is a compact little contrivance somewhat on the order of an organ. The stops, such as an organ has, control the light colors, which are blended and harmonized by other stops. Each day at 4 o'clock this device is demonstrated, and it has been a source of much wonderment and interest to theatrical managers and producers who are interested in overcoming, if possible, the confusion and misjudgment which so often lead to incongruous light effects in theatrical productions.

The Stage Society exhibition is being given under the direction of Mrs. Norman Hapgood, and among those who are generally with her are Mrs. Amos Pinchot, Mrs. Patrick Campbell, Mrs. Charles Dana Gibson, Mlle. Dorziat, Mr. and Mrs. August Belmont, Mr. and Mrs. Howard Cushing, Mrs. Archibald Alexander, William Faversham, and Paul Cravath.

Yesterday the exhibition was for children, and the regular admission fee was reduced one-half. The profit from the show will be turned over to the Committee of Mercy or White Cross, an international, neutral, non-sectarian organization which is striving throughout the Union to raise money to alleviate the destitution among the women and children and other non-combatants in the war in Europe.

Toys for "Suzi" Audiences.

Otto Hauerbach, not content with collecting his royalties as author of "Suzi" and directing chorus rehearsals, has discovered a new field of activity, and yesterday he presented to the management 50,000 toys to be distributed to the patrons of the Casino Theatre. These toys are in the form of a tin beetle and when pressed together make a noise like the tick of a watch. Mr. Hauerbach's idea is to have the audience press these toys while Jose Collins and Tom McNaughton are singing the song "Ticking Love Taps for You." The method in Mr. Hauerbach's madness is that it may increase his royalties from the song.

Harry Lauder Coming.

William Morris will present Harry Lauder at the New York Theatre for one week beginning with a matinée Monday, Nov. 23. The Scottish comedian, now engaged in his seventh tour of this country, will offer a series of numbers from a new song répertoire which he has assembled for the forthcoming engagement. Lauder returned from Australia Oct. 15.

Columbia University Plays.

The Philolexian Society of Columbia University will present for the first time in America "The Chronicle History of King Liens at the Brinckerhoff Theatre, Bradway, at 119th Street, on Friday and Saturday evenings and on Saturday afternoon. Since 1910 the society, continuing its policy of producing Elizabethan plays, has given several of the old masterpieces, including "Ralph Roister Doister" and "Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay."

Harcourt Writes New Book.

Cyril Harcourt, who is appearing at Winthrop Ames's Little Theatre in his own comedy, "A Pair of Silk Stockings," has just completed a new novel entitled "First Cousin to a Dream." It is a sequel to his other novel, "The World's Daughter," and will be brought out shortly by the same publishers.

NOT A REAL WAR.

Name of Hippodrome Spectacle Confusing to Public.

In an effort to overcome the general impression that the current offering, "Wars of the World," has some relation or reference to the conflict raging abroad, the management of the New York Hippodrome has addressed a communication to the leading organizations of New York setting forth the real character of the attraction, which is described as "a flirtation with history."

After running nearly three months the management has ascertained, through diligent inquiry, that the name of the attraction has proved sufficiently misleading to deter some patrons from attending the performance, hence the present campaign of education to inform the public as to the real character of the production. The employment of the title "Wars of the World" is purely in an allegorical sense. This is attested by such episodes as "War of Sports," "War of Pleasure," &c., all of frivolous nature.

Girl from Utah's Birthday.

Next Wednesday night will be extraordinary in more than one way at the Knickerbocker Theatre when Julia Sanderson, Donald Brian, Joseph Cawthorn and their companion players in "The Girl From Utah" become a hundred nights old. For a week or more already preparations have been secretly carried on to observe the night and give not only the girl, but the boys from Utah a very original stage birthday party.

HEINE ON THE GERMAN WAR SPIRIT.

Foretold the Triumph of the New Religion Which Nietzsche and Treitschke Were to Preach.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The opening quotation used by Douglas Sladen as the keynote of his book, "The Real 'Truth about Germany'" (just published by Putnam) is a remarkable prophecy concerning the German people that was uttered eighty years ago by the German poet, Heinrich Heine, as follows:

Christianity—and this is its highest merit—has in some degree softened, but it could not destroy, that brutal German joy of battle. When once that taming talisman, the cross, breaks in two, the savagery of the old fighters, the senseless Berserker fury—of which the Norse poets sing and say so much—will gush up anew. That talisman is decayed, and the day will come when it will piteously collapse. Then the old stone gods will arise from the silent ruins and will rub the dust of a thousand years from their eyes. Thor with his giant's hammer will at last spring up and shatter to bits the Gothic cathedrals.

How literally that last touch in Heine's prophecy has been fulfilled before our own eyes, the ruins, or the departed glories, of the cathedrals of martyred Belgium and of Rheims will bear witness.

But what is even more startling to the thoughtful student is the accuracy with which Heine foresaw the general spirit that would, one day, be regnant in Germany, when the Treitschke-Nietzsche-Bernhardi doctrine that "might makes right" would be officially adopted as the guiding principles of the Foreign and War Offices of Germany.

"World-power or downfall"; "territorial expansion by means of armaments"; "the gospel of 'the mailed fist,' of making your way by force of arms"; "conquer and then Germanize the world," spreading "German culture" by means of the sword—these are the master words that now seem to be guiding a Prussianized Germany, that is, if Treitschke and Bernhardi are true interpreters.

Prof. J. A. Cramb certainly knew his Germany as few Britons have known it; indeed, he was so sympathetic with many German points of view that in his "Germany and England" he says some things that your thick-and-thin "Britisher" will not like at all. His little book is only a posthumous fragment—a mere torso of the epochmaking book which he would have given to his countrymen if he had not died ten months before the outbreak of this war. With remarkable prescience he looked upon such a war as more than probable, indeed as imminent. Lord Roberts truly says that it is a book which "every one who wishes to understand the present crisis should read, as nowhere else are the forces which led to the war so clearly set forth." Its closing chapter contains an illuminating epitome of the attitude toward Christianity that is taken by some of the most potent leaders in the philosophic and political life of present-day Germany, which strikingly bears out Heine's remarkable prophecy.

Those who believe in Britain's cause in this war—and especially those in neutral countries who have reluctantly come to the conclusion that the "German Peril" is to be feared as a menace to the whole world—find this conviction strengthened by the account Prof. Cramb gives of the tendencies in religion which threaten to dominate the German people. The following is a condensation of several pregnant pages of Cramb's book, where he paraphrases Treitschke's teachings on religion:

Judea and Galilee cast their dreary spell over Greece and Rome when Greece and Rome were sinking into decrepitude. And when, in the fifth century, Rome was conquered by the German hordes, Germany and the whole Teutonic people, dazzled by the authority of the Roman Empire, made the great error of adopting the religion of the vanquished. Germany's own deep religious instinct—her native genius for religion, manifested in her creative success (as seen in the Gothic abbeys and cathedrals that are the living witness to the Teuton's imagination in the new religion)—was arrested, stunted, thwarted.

For thirty generations Germany has struggled and wrestled to see with eyes that are not her eyes, to worship a God that was not her God, to live with a world-vision that was not her vision, and to strive for a heaven that was not her heaven. But now Germany no longer proposes to submit to this alien creed, derived from an alien clime. She will no longer confront the ages as the borrower of her religion—her own genius for religion numbed and paralyzed.

And what is the religion which, on the whole, may be characterized as the religion of the most earnest and passionate minds of Young Germany? What is the new movement? The movement, the governing idea of the centuries from the fourteenth to the nineteenth, is the wrestle of the German intellect not only against Rome, but against Christianism itself.

The seventeenth century flung off Rome; the eighteenth undermined Galilee itself; in the nineteenth Strauss completed the task that Eichorn began; and, with the opening of the twentieth century Germany, her long travail past, is reunited to her pristine genius, her creative power in religion and thought.

Hence the significance of Nietzsche. Kant compromises, timid and old; Strauss, while rejecting the metaphysic and miracles of Christianity, clung to its ethics. But Nietzsche clears away the "accumulated rubbish" of 1,200 years; he attempts to set the German imagination back where it was with Alaric, [the Goth who sacked Rome in 410,] and, thus fortified by the experience of twelve centuries, to confront the darkness—unaided, unappalled, triumphant, great and free.

Thus, in preparing a world-empire, Germany is also preparing to create a world-religion—the religion of valor, reinterpreted by Napoleon and Nietzsche, the glory of action, heroism, the doing of great things. In Europe as a whole, and especially in Germany, two great spirit-forces are now contending for men's allegiance—Napoleon and Christ. And in the New Germany Corsica has conquered Galilee.

This is the faith of the Young Germany of today:

"Ye have heard how in old times it was said, Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth; but I say unto you, Blessed are the valiant, for they shall make the earth their throne. And ye have heard men say, Blessed are the poor in spirit; but I say unto you, Blessed are the great in soul and the free in spirit, for they shall enter into Valhalla. And ye have heard men say, Blessed are the peacemakers; but I say unto you, Blessed are the warmakers, for they shall be called, if not the children of Jehovah, the children of Odin (and the children of Thor,) who are greater than Jehovah."

Thus according to Cramb, the New Germany, finding the Religion of the Divine Man of Galilee to be alien to her genius, proposes to substitute for Christianity her Religion of Valor. She is to give the world a new God (Odin or Thor) in the place of "The God and Father of Our Lord Jesus Christ"; a new code of ethics and a new set of Beatitudes in the place of the Sermon on the Mount; and Valhalla, as the new Heaven. If she is consistent she ought, then, to canonize her great gun-maker; and, if she is victorious, then the anniversary of "The Day" when she dictated terms of peace to Britain, as her "enemy of enemies," ought to be celebrated hereafter by all true Germans as "St. Krupp's Day."

If Cramb has correctly described "the ethical foundations of modern German Imperialism," then it is high time for Britons all over the world to open their ears afresh to Kipling's bugle-notes—

For all we have and are,
For all our children's fate,
Stand up and meet the war—
The Hun is at the gate—and help give Kitchener more than all the men he is asking for.

RICHARD D. HARLAN.

Washington, D. C., Nov. 1, 1914.

TURKEY'S PART IN THE WAR.

Exception Taken to the Strictures of Prof. Hart.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

In his criticism of the Turkish Army in last SUNDAY'S TIMES Prof. Hart says that it was "abjectly defeated by three small nations." I wish to remind the eminent professor that there were four nations, and not three, and that their sum total of soldiers exceeded that of the Turkish Army. He further omits to state a most important factor in the Turkish defeat, namely, that Turkey, one month before that war, upon the assurances of the powers of the Triple Entente to the effect that they would never allow the Balkan States to wage war upon her, had demobilized a magnificent army of 125,000 men, and that the largest part of this army was scattered broadcast through Asia Minor, and the men, having scarcely reached their homes before the war broke out, could not be quickly recalled and forwarded to the front. Prof. Hart forgets to mention, also, the resistance put up by the Turks at the last defense of Chatalja; he further forgets, intentionally or unintentionally, the likewise heroic defense of Scutari, Janina, and, last, but not least, Adrianople. Is there abjectness in being defeated under such conditions?

Referring to the actual Turkish Army, Prof. Hart asserts that "hundreds of thousands of men call themselves soldiers, and that a score of vessels name themselves a navy." This is his own appreciation. Apparently the powers of the Triple Entente differ from him, for it is no secret that these powers have tried their best to prevent Turkey from joining the war on the side of Germany and Austria-Hungary.

I will again quote the professor: "Even the so-called Cabinet [Turkish] is divided, one faction holding out the white flag, while the other fires its guns at the Allies." We can remind him that the same condition prevailed in the British Cabinet, and this fact did not call forth, as far as can be remembered, the eminent professor's criticism. Would the professor like to see Turkey sit still and see herself divided between Russia and England?

The professor constantly refers to non-Moslem subjects of Turkey as "Christians," without specifying their respective races, and says that "Turkey has made a mistake in allowing them to remain as units and to keep their own languages, religions, &c." This might have been a political mistake, but it certainly evidences the spirit of toleration shown by the Turks toward their conquered races, and is in distinct contradiction to the assertion that the "Turks destroy everything."

The whole Turkish Nation, as well as the entire Mohammedan world, is united to a man to throw in its lot with Germany and Austria-Hungary in a supreme effort to prevent further encroachment upon the integrity of the Turkish Empire.

LATEST DEALINGS IN THE REALTY FIELD

J. Harper Poor Sells His Residence Recently Completed on Sixty-ninth Street.

$350,000 WEST SIDE LEASE

Activity Continues in the Bronx —Buyers at Garden City—The Leasing Market.

The feature of the realty market yesterday was the sale by J. Harper Poor of his new residence at 33 East Sixty-ninth Street, between Park and Madison Avenues. The buyer is said to be a resident of Manhattan, who will occupy the house.

The dwelling, which is one of the newest of the fine houses lately erected in the Lenox Hill section, was completed two years ago from plans by Howells & Stokes. It is five stories high, fronting 25 feet. Adjoining on the east is the home of Charles Lane Poor. The Park Avenue block front has been improved with two residences, each 102 by 125 feet, the Sixty-ninth Street corner being that of Commodore Arthur Curtiss James, and the Seventieth Street corner for George Blumenthal. This entire frontage was formerly the site of the Union Theological Seminary.

The sale was made through the firm of William B. May & Co. The buyer was represented in the transaction by Newman & Newgass, attorneys.

$350,000 West Side Lease.

Another moving-picture theatre is planned for the west side as the result of a twenty-one years' lease just obtained by a syndicate headed by Lewis C. Van Riper from the Coe estate of the property at 2,182 to 2,186 Broadway, fronting 77 feet between Seventy-seventh and Seventy-eighth Streets, with an extension to 227 to 231 West Seventy-seventh Street, fronting 50 feet there. A two-story taxpayer, which has been used as a market and a garage, occupies the plot, and it will be remodeled from plans by Thomas W. Lamb for the projected theatre. The aggregate lease for the term will be about $350,000. Thomas P. C. O'Brien acted as the broker in the transaction.

Bronx Borough.

The Airmor Company has sold to Michael Alleman the private house at 15 Weiber Court, which runs from Third to Washington Avenue, between 164th and 165th Streets. The plot is 49 by 22.

Eugene J. Busher has sold for the Dollar Savings Bank the plot 156 by 100 on the southwest corner of Grant Avenue and McClellan Street to a builder who will erect five-story flats on the property.

George W Scott and H. E. Connolly have sold for James F. Meehan to Frank Jewell 819 Manida Street, a two-family brick dwelling, on a lot 25 by 100.

Robert Clemens has sold to Gustav M. Kutschinski 650 East 181st Street, a five-story flat, on a plot 35 by 113. The purchaser gave in exchange West Hoboken property.

Sales at Garden City.

Several residences and plots have been sold at Garden City recently by Gage E. Tarbell, among them being the residence on the south side of Garden Street, between Washington and Prospect Avenues, to Mrs Mary Agnes Flugel; a plot 60 by 100 on the east side of Kilburn Road, between Chester and Salisbury Avenues, to the Arm Realty Company for improvement; the plot 80 by 100 on the west side of Brixton Road, between Stewart and Startford Avenues, to Augusta Henderson for improvement; the plot 100 by 111 on the northwest corner of Euston and Newmarket Roads to John F. Stricker for improvement; to B. L. Atwater the plot adjoining his home on Nassau Boulevard and the plot 100 by 150 on the southeast corner of Nassau Boulevard and Chester Avenue.

Brooklyn.

Frank A. Seaver has sold the one-family brick house at 6,744 Bridge Boulevard for L. Obermeyer to an investor, also the one-family brick house at 1,053 Seventy-fourth Street for Kushner & Gold, to N. Lorenzen for occupancy, and the plot 40 by 100 on the south side of Forty-sixth Street, 320 feet east of Sixteenth Avenue, for William Searing to a builder.

Westchester.

Joseph Kane has purchased a dwelling on Janoxin Avenue, Yonkers, for occupancy, from the First Mortgage & Real Estate Company of Bronxville. The firm of Burke Stone acted as brokers.

New Jersey.

Edward P. Hamilton & Co. have sold the two frame dwellings, on plot 75 by 125, at 48 and 52 Brighton Avenue, East Orange.

Commercial Leases.

The Cross & Brown Company has leased a store on the Forty-seventh Street side of the Strand Theatre building to John Dipalma.

The Houghton Company has leased for the Waunegan Realty Company the two connecting four-story dwellings at 113 and 115 West Eighty-eighth Street to Esteben Ortega.

The Duross Company has leased for Herman F. Eppel to John Magee the six-story building at 209 West Eighteenth Street for an automobile warehouse.

M. & L. Hess have leased the store and basement at 103 Fifth Avenue to Atlas & Bluhm.

LARGEST APARTMENT HOUSE IN THE BOROUGH OF QUEENS GOING UP ON ENTIRE BLOCK FRONT IN ASTORIA SECTION

Four-Story Building on Barclay Street, Opposite East River Park, Will Contain 380 Rooms and 84 Baths —Builder Is a Veteran Operator in Manhattan Who Sees Great Future in Multi-Family Houses in Long Island City's Industrial Area.

THE largest apartment house in Long Island City is now being erected on the entire block front on the east side of Barclay Street, between Ditmars Avenue and McClellan Place. The plot has a frontage of 200 feet with a depth of 100 feet. The building will be four stories high and will contain eighty-four suites, with two stores on the ground floor. The suites are divided into three, four, and five rooms with bath, making a total of 380 rooms for the structure and eighty-four baths.

The site of this unusual improvement is opposite the new East River Park and readily accessible to transit facilities. The estimated cost of the building has been placed at $150,000 by the builder, John Katzman, and with the land the investment will reach $177,000. The property, containing ten lots, was purchased by Mr. Katzman a short time ago from the Rickert-Finlay Realty Company for $27,000.

Mr. Katzman has been for the last ten years one of the largest builders on Washington Heights, having erected in that section forty-two houses, containing over 1,200 apartments. Previous to that he was a large operator on the lower east side, where he built nearly 100 tenement houses in the most congested section of New York. He has made a study and a success of small apartments, and the fact that he has closed up his business in Manhattan and has begun the largest flat operation in Long Island City is of peculiar interest as indicating his faith in the rapid future growth not only of that particular section of Queens, but of other readily accessible portions of the borough.

"For about ten years," said Mr. Katzman yesterday in explaining the reason for selecting Long Island City for his future operations, "my principal building activities have been along the Broadway Subway between 156th Street and 204th Street, from six to nine miles from Forty-second Street, and to which the actual running time is twenty-three to thirty-one minutes by Subway express trains from the Grand Central Subway Station.

"I was, therefore, much impressed when I found that Hoyt Avenue, Astoria, the first express stop after leaving the Queensboro Bridge Plaza, would be only eleven minutes from the Grand Central Subway Station, or less than half the time required to reach 156th Street and one-third the time to 204th Street.

"For the corner of 156th Street and Amsterdam Avenue I paid $50,000 for a plot 50 by 100 feet, which is at the rate of $20,000 for each 20-foot lot. For the northwest corner of 191st Street and Wadsworth Avenue, 100 by 100 feet, I paid $60,000, or at the rate of $12,000 a lot. For the corner of 204th Street and Vermilyea Avenue, nine miles from Forty-second Street, I paid $50,000 for a plot 100 by 100 feet, which is at the rate of $10,000 a lot. These prices, you understand, are not high prices for that section, for I have paid as high as $40,000 each for lots on St. Nicholas Avenue.

"On my Long Island City property, for which I paid only $2,700 per lot, I am now erecting practically the same type of buildings which I built on lots along the line of the Broadway Subway, costing from $10,000 to $20,000 each, and I can afford to rent my flats in Long Island City for much less than the rental in upper Manhattan. In these times, when the cost of living is very closely figured by every one, tenants are endeavoring to find where they can get the most for their money, and I am satisfied that when the low rents in the Long Island City section become fully known thousands will find in these low-priced flats a solution of the high cost of living.

"For apartments containing three rooms and bath I get on Washington Heights an average of $27 per month, for four rooms $32, and for five rooms $40 per month. In Long Island City, directly opposite the park, I will rent three-room apartments with bath for $17, four rooms for $20, and five rooms for $24 per month. There is a clear saving of from $10 to $16 a month for the same number of rooms and in a location which will be only one-half the time to 156th Street and one-third the time to 204th Street by subway express trains.

"Not only will tenants in this Queens section save one-third of the rent they are now paying and reach their homes in one-third to one-half the time now required to the above locations, but they will also have the further advantage of being able to use all three branches of the dual subway system, as trains of the Interborough Subway system, trains of the Interborough elevated system, and trains of the Brooklyn Rapid Transit system will all run over the tracks of the Second Avenue elevated in Long Island City.

"Another advantage which residents of Astoria have is the fact that they live close to the greatest industrial development in New York, for nowhere else are so many great factory buildings going up, which will give work to thousands of employes."

Special attention has been paid to a maximum of light and air for these new apartments. Under the old building laws, interior apartments opened on courts only a few feet wide. In covering a whole block front and with land reasonably low in price it is possible to provide courts large enough to give interior apartments practically as much light and air as those fronting on the street. The two courts in this new building will cover an area of nearly 1,200 square feet each, and dark stairways will be wholly eliminated.

Within the last year the demand for good, reasonable priced flats in Queens, within the neighborhood of the growing industrial centre, has been very noticeable and the pioneer builders who have erected houses of this sort have been well repaid for their investment. For some of these newer apartments it has been stated that there are waiting lists. As the transit improvements advance nearer to completion it is predicted that a big activity in apartment house construction will arise.

During the past week in Queens applications were filed for the erection of new buildings at an estimated cost of $342,000. There were seventy-six applications for alterations, costing $58,400, and fifty-five applications for plumbing permits to cost $31,100, making the total estimated cost of operations $431,500.

The Mathews Building Company has started tenement developments on Eleventh Avenue south of Grand Avenue, on Grand Avenue east of Eleventh Avenue, and on Eleventh Avenue north of Newtown Road, Long Island City, at a total cost of $110,000. Albert Hoder will erect several three-story brick tenements on Grand Avenue west of Steinway Avenue, Long Island City, at a cost of $8,000 each. Donato Brothers are planning several four-story brick tenements on Payntar Avenue to cost $11,500 each.

The plans to alter the Queensboro Bridge so as to fit it for rapid transit trains have been followed with interest by Queens residents, and it was with considerable satisfaction that the announcement last week from the Queens Chamber of Commerce was received, to the effect that Borough President McAneny has recommended that the corporate stock committee of the Board of Estimate make an immediate appropriation of about $400,000 for changes in the Queensboro Bridge to adapt it for operation of rapid transit trains.

The removal of the inside set of trolley tracks to provide for the operation of trolley cars on the brackets outside of the main trusses.

The repavement of the entire floor of the lower level for vehicular traffic.

The relocation of the footwalks on the upper level outside of the main trusses.

It is understood, however, that no action will be taken at the present time in providing for the operation of the Brooklyn Rapid Transit Broadway-Fifty-ninth Street Subway cars across the bridge, as the change in the bridge for this work will only take eighteen months.

BRONXVILLE APARTMENTS.

Success of Recent Operations Stimulates New Building Projects.

A new apartment house operation is projected in the near future at Bronxville, on the northwest corner of Boyd Place and Pondfield Road West, near the entrance to Cedar Knolls. The property was recently purchased by Stacey W. Kapp from the First Mortgage and Real Estate Company and the estate of James Boyd. Title was passed subject to a restriction against erecting on the plot anything but a fireproof building.

Two apartment structures were recently completed on Pondfield Road West by the Lawrence Park Realty Company, containing thirty-two apartments, and all are occupied. The company has completed the first section of the scheme of development for its Alger tract, which calls for a total of twelve houses grouped around a central parked plaza.

The Eastchester Mortgage and Realty Company, which two years ago built an apartment house on Pondfield Road East, is said to be contemplating further operations of the same character.

Victoria Theatre Sale Tomorrow.

Hammerstein's Victoria Theatre at Seventh Avenue and Forty-second Street will be sold in the Vesey Street Salesroom tomorrow by the M. Morgenthau, Jr., Company. The sale is the result of a friendly readjustment action on the part of Oscar Hammerstein and his co-partner, due to the recent death of his son, William Hammerstein.

A few days before Justice Donnelly signed an order confirming the sale, a lease of the property was recorded by the Hammerstein Amusement Company to Arthur Hammerstein and Lyle D. Andrews. The lease is to extend from Oct. 19, 1914, to April 20, 1924. The rental was given as $37,000 and taxes annually, and also 35 per cent. of the net profits.

Subway Extension to Yonkers.

A meeting of property owners to urge the extension of the present Subway from 242d Street to Yonkers will be held next Wednesday evening at Lavelle Hall, 260th Street and Riverdale Avenue. It is expected that borough officials will address the meeting.

STATEN ISLAND PLANS FOR FUTURE GROWTH

With more undeveloped usable waterfront than all the other boroughs of the Greater City put together, Richmond this week began a campaign to prepare for the big port development predicted to follow the conclusion of the war.

The Staten Island Civic League, the largest civic improvement body in the borough, has just published its programme for 1915 which includes the entire reorganization and centralization of the Post Office system, a scientific city plan and a campaign to procure for Staten Island the New York free port advocated by the Merchants' Association.

The Civic League, since its organization two years ago, has become a large and efficient organization. It has an excellent record of accomplishments behind it, but it has never before definitely set forth a programme to be concentrated upon.

It believes now, however, that Staten Island must soon come into its own and that development may be both hastened and guided in such a way that ultimately Richmond will be the best ordered and most beautiful borough in the city.

A member of the league said yesterday:

"The Borough of Richmond undoubtedly has the worst Post Office system in this part of the country. With a population of 95,000 spread over fifty-seven square miles of territory—twice and half again as big as Manhattan—it has twenty-two Post Offices.

"These are relics of the old days when Staten Island was a collection of forty-three separate towns and villages. When consolidation was effected in 1898, the civic administration was, of course, centralized, but the Post Office system remained unchanged, and it has done more than any other one thing to prevent the fusion of all sections and the development of a real borough spirit.

"Its workings are curious. A letter addressed to Port Richmond and mailed at West New Brighton, less than two miles away, goes first to the railway Post Office at St. George more than three miles away, where it is rehandled and then is started upon its four-mile journey back along its first route, finally arriving at the Port Richmond office anywhere from twelve to twenty-four hours after it was mailed. In order to remedy this evil and others like it, the Civic League has begun a public campaign for a centralized system and does not intend to rest until it gets it.

"The Civic League has a vision of enormous development for the 'Borough of the Future,' which has fifty-four miles of waterfront and thousands of acres of undeveloped upland. In order to guide this development and make efficient co-operation possible, a real city plan is absolutely necessary. This will not be a civic beautification project, but a scientific presentation, based upon present indications, of the various zones to be devoted to manufacturing, dock and warehouse construction, parks, retail business centres, farming, and residential development.

"Such a plan will make it possible for the transportation companies to extend their service to thinly populated districts with certainty about the future and not on a gamble. It will steady the real estate market and protect both the buyer and the holder of land. Richmond and Queens are the only boroughs of the city in which such work can now be done.

"While the Civic League keeps open house the year around for seekers after manufacturing sites, it is going to give the Merchants' Association all the aid in its power in its campaign for a free port for New York and, at the same time, begin a campaign of its own to procure the free port for Staten Island.

"The free port, which would provide a place where dutiable goods could be transshipped and even manipulated within a restricted area without payment of duty and could be stored without payment of bonded warehouse fees, would be a great asset to any section. Staten Island and South Brooklyn are the only locations available for such a project in Greater New York, and the Staten Island Civic League believes that, with the co-operation of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, which has direct and quick connection with the mainland, Staten Island, with its cheap land and great stretches of undeveloped waterfront, can be made much the more advantageous of the two.

"Much development work is expected to be done by a new committee of the Civic League which is now being organized by Secretary M. K. Nash to be called the Trade Development Committee. The membership of the committee will be made up of manufacturers and business men who will work together in the name of the Civic League and with its support.

"Staten Island has so many possibilities that heretofore those who have worked for its interests have often become confused at the multiplicity of things they might do and ended, sometimes, by doing nothing. The Civic League's idea in presenting a definite programme for the coming year is, without slighting the work already under way, to provide three distinct projects, each of which requires a separate kind of effort and will produce a different kind of result, while, at the same time, they will all be parts of a far-reaching plan."

TALL CONCRETE BUILDING

What is said to be the tallest steel reinforced concrete building in the world has just been completed by the Gair Company on the Brooklyn water front between the terminals of the Brooklyn and Manhattan bridges. It is the seventh structure of the Gair group of loft buildings, but outtops the others in being twelve stories high and surmounted by a clock of four additional stories. It covers a plot 200 by 125 feet and the height to the roof of the tower is 275 feet from the street.

The company will use part of the building and lease the remainder to manufacturers. The equipment for heavy commercial business is very complete, including three freight and two passenger elevators, loading platforms, and a sheltered driveway and admirable railroad shipping connections.

The floors in the tower each measuring 50 by 50 feet are adapted to studio work, owing to their excellent light and noiselessness. The building is absolutely fireproof, equipped with automatic sprinkler protection, and every requirement of the State's new building, labor and fire protection codes has been observed.

BUILDING AT SCARSDALE.

Many Attractive Homes of Colonial and English Architecture Going Up.

Scarsdale and its adjoining home communities in Westchester County have been experiencing considerable building activity this season, and several new houses are now nearing completion for early occupancy. Ground has just been broken by P. Compton Miller for an English Colonial house on Greenacres Avenue, and contracts were signed last week by which Douglas Welsh will erect a Colonial brick house on Brayton Place. The semi-bungalow type of architecture is exemplified in a new home being built for Albert Mehler on Berkeley Avenue, and the English type of construction is well illustrated by the new residence almost finished for Clarence J. Wyckoff on Brayton Place.

Ground has also just been broken for an English residence which will cost about $15,000 for Miss Eleanor M. Stone on Greenacres Avenue. Harvey W. Craw is building on Claremont Avenue, in a new section of Scarsdale Estates, a Colonial residence. Jens Riis is building an attractive home in the same locality.

At Murray Hill Arthur Stewart has just completed two residences, each costing about $12,000, and plans have been prepared for a $20,000 residence for Eugene J. Lang, opposite the Ayres estate.

Counsel for Realty Association.

The Real Estate Association of the State of New York, of which M. Morgenthau, Jr., was recently elected President, has appointed as its counsel to represent the organization at Albany Danforth E. Ainsworth, and as New York counsel I. H. Lehman. A Committee on the Constitutional Convention was appointed at the meeting last week at Albany of the Executive Committee. L. D. Woodworth of Rochester was named as Chairman and Delancey M. Ellis of Albany Vice-Chairman.

The members will formulate suggestions, such as may be deemed necessary to the Constitution in realty interests. The members of the committee from Manhattan include Allan Robinson, Henry Bloch, I. H. Lehman, Thomas M. Mulry, Edward P. Doyle, and Elisha Sniffen.

OCTOBER BUILDING RECORD.

Figures from Eighty Leading Cities Show 11 Per Cent. Decrease.

In spite of generally favorable weather conditions, there was a continued restriction of building activity during October, permits issued for new construction, according to returns received by Dun's Review from eighty leading centres of the United States, calling for the expenditure of $41,642,306, showing a decrease of about 11 per cent., as compared with a year ago.

The total for Greater New York again showed an increase over 1913, an aggregate of $8,301,196 comparing with $6,771,059, moderate losses in the Boroughs of Richmond and Queens being more than offset by the expansion in Manhattan, Brooklyn, and the Bronx. Considered as a whole, the cities outside of New York make an unsatisfactory exhibit with a decline from last year of 16.7 per cent., the value of the permits granted at these points being $33,341,110, against $40,012,484 in the earlier period.

Of the seventy-nine cities outside of New York, twenty-seven reported more or less improvement in comparison with October a year ago.

On the other hand, there was a sharp falling off at a number of important centres, including Detroit, Kansas City, Baltimore, Boston, and Buffalo. The October figures, with comparisons for earlier dates, follow:

	Cities.	1914.	1913.
October	80	$41,642,306	$46,785,542
September	84	42,957,381	55,768,000

STUDY PROBLEM OF LAND RESTRICTIONS

Real Estate Men Appointed to Co-operate with Mayor's Committee on City Zones.

VARYING COURT DECISIONS

Countless Troubles in Ancient Covenants Which Have Long Outlived Usefulness.

An important step toward bringing order out of the chaos which prevails regarding real estate covenants has just been made by the Advisory Council of real estate interests in appointing a special committee to investigate the question of restrictive covenants as they apply to real estate in New York City. The members of the committee are Adolph T. Sieker, Chairman, Everett V. Abbot, Henry R. Chittick, Walter Lindner, and Alfred C. Reeves.

Restrictive covenants affecting land in this city, it is stated by the committee, are a source of annoyance to all real estate men. Designed, for the most part, in the days when New York was young and it seemed necessary that certain localities of the city should be set apart for certain defined uses, and that uses undesirable to people of refined tastes should be prohibited, they have either outlived their usefulness or have been so twisted and mangled as to their effect by the courts that no one is able to say what their effect may be.

Court decisions have by no means been uniform on the subject. Thus, to pick out a few examples, to change a private residence on Twentieth Street into a business building is allowed, but an attempt to do so on Fortieth Street is halted by an injunction; to erect a tenement house on Tenth Avenue makes an owner subject to money damages, but apartment houses of fifteen or more stories are permitted in the exclusive West Seventies and in the Murray Hill district. An undertaking establishment is not objectionable on Madison Avenue, but a bakeshop amounts to a nuisance on Southern Boulevard; a paraffin refinery is a nuisance in the Erie Basin, but the elevated railroad is not an obnoxious use in the Bronx; an apartment house is a private dwelling on West Seventy-eighth Street, but a three-family house on Sedgwick Avenue is not a private house.

What makes the situation worse is the circumstance that the courts, though failing to enforce them, hold the covenants against a seller's interest, and always an incumbrance. No matter how ridiculous it may seem, for instance, to enforce a private house covenant on Thirty-fourth Street and Broadway, or one against the erection of a flathouse on East 100th Street, the fact remains that any one who attempts to sell certain properties in either locality without making mention of the covenant in his contract is liable to have his title rejected.

These conditions cannot be remedied till the attention of the courts has been called to the conditions. It is proposed to do so by a memorandum or in such other manner as seems feasible to the end that the evil may be corrected. Mr. Sieker's committee will co-operate with the Mayor's Committee on City Zones, which has important work to undertake with reference to building heights and proper zones for the operation of certain trades and businesses. The question of restrictive covenants will play a very important part in such a plan and it will be necessary for the Advisory Council to go thoroughly into this subject before a definite report can be submitted to the Committee on City Planning.

TRADE CREEPING UP MADISON AVENUE

NEW 76TH ST. OPERATION

Three-story Structure for Park & Tilford Replaces Dwelling—Siegel Home Altered.

Madison Avenue, north of Fifty-ninth Street, is undergoing a business transformation somewhat similar to that which has changed the Murray Hill district and the blocks immediately to the south from a choice residential to a commercial thoroughfare. With the exception of the three or four blocks in the Murray Hill restrictive zone and two or three blocks just north, there is little below Forty-second Street that has not been usurped by trade. North of the Grand Central district the trade expansion extends to Forty-ninth Street, and does not appear in force again until Fifty-sixth Street is reached.

From that point north to Eighty-sixth Street the business invasion has been rapid within the past two years. There are, of course, still many blocks which retain their old-time private home characteristics, but the incursions into so many blocks which were still in that class up to a year or two ago lead one to accept the prediction—by no means new—that Madison Avenue is destined to be a great business thoroughfare running through the choicest residential district of the city.

There are several blocks, especially in the Lenox Hill area, which are restricted and where trade cannot, for many years, at least, encroach. Within the past year the residence on the northwest corner of Seventy-sixth Street just below the fine Milliken home with its apple garden, was remodeled for trade, and immediately opposite, on the southwest corner, a new three-story buisness building has just been finished, replacing the old residence at 30 East Seventy-sixth Street, fronting 20 feet on the street by 102.2—half the block on Madison Avenue. The building has been completed for the occupancy of Park & Tilford. They will use the ground floor and basement and the two upper floors will be rented for lofts and offices, thus differing from the method employed in alterations for trade when it is usual to arrange the upper floors as small apartments.

This Seventy-sixth Street structure has been erected from plans by the architect Herbert M. Baer. It is finished in white stucco in an attractive manner and special effort has been made to give a maximum of window space on the entire Madison Avenue frontage.

The same architect has prepared plans for Park & Tilford's second Madison Avenue building, on the northeast corner of Fifty-eighth Street, where the excavation work has lately been completed. This will be somewhat larger, covering a plot 50 by 150, and the exterior will be finished in white matt glazed terra cotta. When completed Park & Tilford will abandon their present store in that neighborhood, on Fifth Avenue and Sixtieth Street, concentrating their east side business in both of the Madison Avenue stores.

One of the largest transfers of property on upper Madison Avenue was recently closed when Charles Golden took title to the half block front forming the southeast corner of Seventy-eighth Street, adjoining the Don Carlos apartment, owned by him, on the Seventy-seventh Street corner. He acquired at the Hennessy partition sale last July the five dwellings at 1,003 to 1,009 Madison Avenue and 44 East Seventy-eighth Street, a plot 82.2 by 100, and later purchased the house at 1,001 Madison Avenue, completing his ownership of the block, 204 feet frontage, and making him one of the largest Madison Avenue realty holders above Fifty-ninth Street.

The demand for store space has grown very perceptibly north of Sixtieth Street recently, and several houses between that point and Seventy-fifth Street have been altered for trade during the past year. Plans were also filed last week for altering the former Washington E. Connor residence at 532 Madison Avenue, northwest corner of Fifty-fourth Street, into stores with apartments on the upper floors at a cost of $10,000. The property has been leased for twenty-one years by Charles B. Halsey and T. J. S. Flint, who lately completed a similar operation on the house at the northwest corner of the avenue and Forty-eighth Street.

It is also interesting to note that the fine residence occupied for many years by Henry Siegel, on the southwest corner of Eighty-second Street, has been extensively altered for business uses.

FLUSHING AVE. EXTENSION.

Briefs to be Presented by Both Sides This Week.

The application of Queens taxpayers, led by Borough President Connolly, to compel the New York and Queens County Railway Company to exercise its franchise by building an extension to the surface line on Astoria (Flushing) Avenue, from Ehret Avenue to Jackson Avenue was again taken up by the Public Service Commission last week. After testimony was taken, the board asked for briefs next week, no decision being made.

President Wood of the railroad company said that if it built the extension now, it would have to remove the tracks within a year, when the grading and paving of the street is undertaken.

He also expressed the opinion that the building of the extension was not warranted at the present.

Borough President Connolly took the stand for the taxpayers, and testified that he thought the proposed extension necessary, and very desirable. He said that the people of East Elmhurst and the territory lying directly to the westward would be benefited, and that it would also relieve the congestion on Jackson Avenue.

As for the grading objection, President Connolly said that the street was not likely to be graded, widened or paved perhaps for ten years.

Important Auction Offering.

At recent auction sales conducted in the Vesey Street salesroom a marked interest has been shown by a large gathering of operators and buyers who have several thousand dollars to invest in New York real estate. Many of these operators have been out of the market for a long time, and although there is no spirited bidding and no high prices are obtained, still there is enough inquiry to warrant the expression that a general feeling of optimism prevails in the real estate market today.

On Tuesday, Dec. 1, at 12 o'clock noon, at the Exchange Salesroom, 14 Vesey Street, Joseph P. Day will offer for various estate holdings a widely scattered list of properties, including loft buildings, tenements, private dwellings, and vacant lots.

Number of Dark Rooms Reduced.

In a report made by Darwin R. James, Jr., Chairman of the Tenement House Committee of the Brooklyn Bureau of Charities, at the semi-annual meeting of the Directors of the bureau last week, there was one significant sentence. It was this:

"The number of windowless rooms was reduced from 1,076 on Oct. 1, 1913, to 97 in October, 1914.

This means that through the energy of the committee, working in conjunction with the Tenement House Department, the great community of Brooklyn has practically no dark room problem in its tenement houses.

Sales in Newark.

The property at 226 and 228 Mulberry Street, 47 by 180, covered by two fine residences, has been sold by the firm of Louis Schlesinger for the Federal Building, Land and Improvement Company, A. H. Hassinger, President, to Elias Berla. They adjoin Mr. Berla's present holdings, who also owns 75 and 77 Green Street. With the newly acquired parcel he has an area of 25,000 square feet. The property sold has been held at $35,000.

Feist & Feist of Newark, N. J., have sold for the John Mentz estate to Robert Robinson for investment, the two-and-a-half-story dwelling at 82 Fairmount Avenue. It is the fifth house on the avenue sold for the Mentz estate within two weeks.

Jersey City Flats Sold.

Howard D. McGeorge has sold to German F. Rowe of Summit, N. J., the five-story Florida flats, on the northeast corner of Barrow and York Streets, Jersey City. The plot is 50 by 125. The sale also included the two six-family frame flats at 78 and 82 Oak Street.

Julius Bergoff has sold to the Central Storage and Realty Company the two four-story brick flats at 109 and 113 Stuyvesant Avenue, Jersey City. The buyer gave in part payment two six-story flats at 69 and 71 Bayview Avenue.

Long Island Sales.

Henry Pierson & Co. have sold a dwelling on the corner of Maple Avenue and Henry Street, plot 135 by 145, at Westbury Manor for the Westbury Manor Company.

Residences or plots at Bellerose have been purchased by Henry W. Pope, Fred J. Lee, Edward M. Schmand, Stephen Fitzgerald, Miss Cornelia B. Keeler, Charles Louis Soldau, and J. Fletcher Watts. The plots were purchased from the United Holding Company.

Old Cotton Mill Sold.

The F. R. Wood, W. H. Dolson Company, in conjunction with the C. B. Anderson Company, have sold the mill property at Pleasant Valley, Dutchess County, to a New York syndicate for the manufacture of cordage, twines, and thread specialties. This property was formerly used as a cotton print works by the late William T. Garner. The plant was formerly valued at $125,000.

FINAL APPEAL ON THE 1914 BUDGET

Made to the Board of Aldermen by Real Estate Board of New York.

SAY REDUCTION IS NEEDED

Increased Tax Rate Will Be Disastrous to Realty in New York Under Present Conditions.

Continuing its efforts to secure a reduction in the city budget for 1914 the Real Estate Board of New York has sent the following letter to the Board of Aldermen as a final appeal in behalf of taxpayers:

"Gentlemen: You are considering a budget submitted to you by the Board of Estimate amounting to $199,238,000.

"This budget is nearly $7,000,000 greater than that of 1914 and is over $80,000,000 higher than the budget of 1906.

"In round figures the adoption of this budget will necessitate an increase of at least 12 points above the 1914 tax rate generally, and of 20 points in the Bronx and 36 points in Richmond.

"The Real Estate Board believes that these increases, if imposed, would have the most serious effect upon real estate in the City of New York, and that the tax levy, based upon such a budget, would be extremely difficult to collect.

"The Controller will tell you that on July 31 last there were $116,000,000 of uncollected taxes, notwithstanding the fact that there had been sales of tax liens in every borough of the city during the last three years.

"Every member of your board is aware that the city cannot borrow, except upon temporary revenue bonds issued in anticipation of the collection of taxes, for the expense of Government.

"It would be extremely unfortunate if by your action in approving the proposed budget you so depressed real estate and discouraged property owners that they would not make the effort necessary, even provided that such effort could be successfully made, to pay their taxes next May. In that event the city would be without the money necessary to conduct its Government.

"It should be remembered also that it is generally believed that assessed valuations are entirely too high and many hundreds of protests and applications for reduction have already been made.

"If the protests are granted and the assessed valuations lowered there would be a still higher rate if the budget remains as it is. If the protests are not granted there will certainly be a great number of certiorari proceedings.

"In view of all these facts and of the fact that there is no State tax this year, the Real Estate Board feels that the budget for 1915 should not, at least, be any greater than that of 1914. They are justified in this belief by the frequent official statements that under the efficient and economical government commenced under such happy auspices five years ago large savings in administration expenses were being effected.

"The budget in detail has not yet been printed and is, therefore, not available for examination by the Real Estate Board, but we are certain that if you will refer this matter to your Finance Committee we will be able to present to you specific items of expenditure that can be reduced without in any way affecting the efficiency of the present City Government, or compelling you to drop from city employ any worthy man. These suggested reductions, if adopted, will be sufficient to enable you to keep the tax rate as it was in 1914.

"THE REAL ESTATE BOARD OF NEW YORK."

Under Section 226 of the Charter the Board of Aldermen may reduce amounts fixed by the Board of Estimate, except amounts fixed by law or required for the payment of State taxes, or for interest and principle of the city debt. Such reductions can be vetoed by the Mayor, but can be repassed by a three-quarter vote of the Board of Aldermen.

L. I. Railroad Traffic.

The winter time table of the Long Island Railroad, which went into effect recently, shows that there will be no reduction in the number of trains operated on the Long Beach division of the road. The summer time table is found to be necessary during the winter months. Less than a decade ago two trains each way daily on the Long Beach division was all that was necessary during the winter months. Now there are about two trains an hour.

Long Island City Lot Sale.

Subway lots along the route of the dual rapid transit system in Long Island City will be offered at auction by Bryan L. Kennelly, on Saturday, Nov. 28, at Fitting Street, adjoining the property. THE GENTLEWOMAN IN DOMESTIC SERVICE

Demand for Those of That Class, One Says, but Good Places Are Hard to Find.

HOUSEWIVES ARE EXACTING

They Insist on Too Close Attention to Detail; Some Complain, and Hours Are Long.

Recently a young woman advertised for a position to do domestic service, stating that she was a woman above the domestic servant class. The case is interesting in view of the agitation that is going on in regard to the young woman of refinement, with no business or professional education, entering protected homes in place of going out to take small wages in a commercial position.

The young woman referred to was quite willing to talk of the situation. There is a demand, she believes, for the better class of women in domestic situations, and yet she has found it difficult to obtain a place she feels that she can keep. Her reason for taking up the work was that, finding herself dependent on her own resources, it seemed the best thing she could do. She had had experience in domestic work in her own home, and as she had no special training in business, it would take time and money to obtain a business education.

Her friends with whom she discussed the idea were of the opinion that it was well worth trying. She has had several positions in the couple of years or so that she has been experimenting, but the advertisement indicated that she had not found one that could be permanent.

"The hours are so very long in domestic service," she says. "To get up at 6 in the morning and work practically all the time until 8 in the evening makes a very long day. It seems to me that if some definite arrangement could be made to give the worker two hours clear in the afternoon, things would go better. While I might have taken that time in the afternoon, I have not felt comfortable in going to my room, feeling that there might be something to do, that the bell might ring and I would be needed."

She is quite dispassionate in her remarks, but she criticises the housewife for many small demands upon the servant which make the work more difficult.

"It is marvelous how many different ways different housekeepers have of doing things. Each can do things best in her own way, and so, very often, can the servant do things best in her way if she has the intelligence and training. One wishes, of course, to conform as far as possible to the ways of the employer, but it seems to me they should look for results, and if they are obtained, the manner of doing it is not an essential. So many women wish every stroke of the work done exactly as they would do it themselves. Standing over a servant and directing every step of the work is another thing that makes it difficult. I have had people ask, when I was taking a place, if I objected to having them in the kitchen or passing through it, and of course I did not. But when I found what was meant was that some one was to stand over me through the entire preparation of a meal, making suggestions and giving advice, I could not stand it."

A number of well-to-do young matrons are saying just now that they are doing their own housework rather than employ the servant of the ordinary type, they are glad of the innovation of the better class houseworker and there is a chance that both problems may be solved.

In speaking of the work being too hard and the hours too long the upper class houseworker was asked if she thought that she, perhaps, took more time than the ordinary servant.

"I think, perhaps, I do," she admitted frankly, "but I doubt if the work could be done with thoroughness and care in less time. I must have things in order and have them well done."

INTERESTING HAPPENINGS IN MOTORDOM DURING THE WEEK

NEW HAVEN ROUTE FOR HARVARD GAME

Directions for Motor Trip to New Yale Bowl Given by Automobile Club.

HOW TO PARK THE CARS

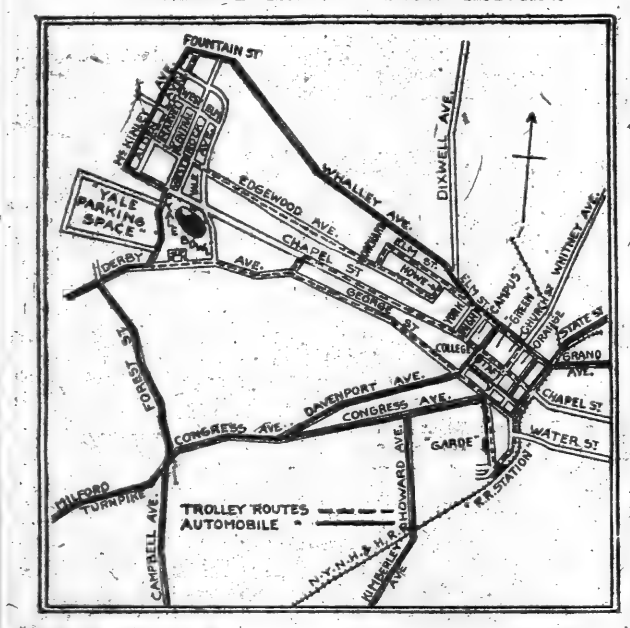
Traffic Regulations in Force for Game Outlined—Mileage Is About 75.

The Yale-Harvard football game at New Haven, on Nov. 21, will be the first to be played in the new stadium—the famous "Yale Bowl." The game starts promptly at 2 o'clock, and as 68,000 tickets have been sold, it would be advisable to reach the stadium early and avoid the last half-hour rush. There will be a great movement of motor cars toward New Haven on that day, from every part of the compass, and an early start is strongly advised by the touring bureau of the Automobile Club of America, which advises the route described below.

Parking space has been provided on the property of the university for 2,000 cars; there will be a charge of $1 for each machine.

To reach New Haven by road run north on Broadway, around Columbus Circle, and into Central Park West, which is all in good condition to 110th Street. Here, turn right—run one block—and then turn left into Seventh Avenue, which is in good condition. With Central Bridge ahead, turn left.

DETAIL MAP IN NEW HAVEN.



5.3—then right—and cross the bridge into Jerome Avenue, which is in fair condition to 167th Street; beyond this point it is very poor. This makes it advisable to turn right at the sign reading "Concourse" into 167th Street, where there is good surface—run up a stiff grade and cross to the far side of the Grand Concourse, 6.5.

Turn left on the right drive, which is in good condition, and run to 188th Street, 8.4. At a garage on the corner turn right and run down hill, go over the railroad, 8.7, jog right and left under the "L" structure, then use caution and take the first turn left into Washington Street, 8.9, (a narrow street with building material piled in places.) Go two blocks and turn right into Pelham Avenue, 9.0; follow this avenue, which is in fine condition, and pass the Zoölogical Gardens, 9.5, to the White Plains Road, 10.1.

From this point there is a choice of roads to New Rochelle; the Pelham Parkway and Shore Road route is in good condition. This goes straight on, across White Plains Road, 10.1, then over the railroad, 11.9; turn left, 12.7, cross Bartow Bridge, 13.2, and take a right fork, 14.0. Bear left, 17.2; then, at the end of the road, turn left into Echo Avenue, 17.3, and turn right into Main Street in New Rochelle, 17.7.

The shorter route from Pelham Avenue is by way of the Boston Post Road. This route has fewer curves and is shorter by one mile than that given above; it will be a time-saver for those in a hurry. This route begins on macadam, after which there is about 300 feet of dirt roadway on the White Plains Road; this portion is rough, but entirely passable. Beyond this stretch and on to New Rochelle the Post Road is in excellent condition, excepting for a temporary bridge over Westchester Inlet; this is short and not at all bad if caution be used.

The directions for this shorter route are:

At White Plains Road, 10.1, turn left, then go on the dirt road referred to above, and take the first right turn into Boston Post Road, 10.3; go straight on, then slow down for a temporary crossing, 12.3; go under the railroad, 13.0; use care crossing a temporary bridge, 13.7; at a monument take the right fork into Main Street, 16.0. Go straight on and pass Echo Avenue in New Rochelle, 16.7. Here change odometer to read 17.7.

Follow the main road through Greenwich, 29.6, and at a monument bear right down Putt's Hill, 29.8; then cross a bridge at Mianus, 31.8. Left fork, 33.9; turn right—cross a bridge, 34.4, into Main Street, pass City Hall, and bear left through square in Stamford, 34.6. At a green take the left fork, 35.1; just beyond bear right up hill; again bear right, leaving trolley, 35.3; go under the railroad, 35.6; cross a bridge, 36.6; then go through Noroton, 37.8. Go straight on under the railroad at Darien, 39.2; bear right, 42.6, and at the armory bear left, 42.7—then at the church bear right into Wall Street, 43.2; go through Norwalk, 43.4.

Go up hill at the green, take the left fork with trolley, 43.7; then at a church turn right with trolley, 43.9; go over a hill, using caution for sharp curves, cross a bridge over the Saugatuck River, 46.7. Go through Westport, 46.8. Follow the main road and cross a bridge, 50.4; then use caution and bear right under the railroad; at once turn left in Southport, 51.0. Bear right, 51.3, cross a bridge, 51.6, bear right, 52.2, at a library turn right with trolley in Fairfield 52.6. Bear left into Fairfield Avenue, 52.7; cross a bridge, 54.1; go under the railroad, 55.5, take a left fork—still Fairfield Avenue, 55.7; go straight on across Main Street in Bridgeport, 57.4. Go under railroad viaduct, cross drawbridge, 57.7 and 58.1.

At once take left fork in Connecticut Avenue, 58.2, go straight on, then meet and follow trolley on Stratford Avenue, 59.4, turn left with trolley into Main Street, 60.8, and at a watertrough with "A. C. A." yellow arrow signs, turn right with trolley in Stratford, 61. Cross a bridge, 62.3, then go straight on leaving the trolley at Devon, 62.9. Follow the main road to the end of the green, and at the Public Library, turn left with the trolley in Milford, 65.6. Go under the railroad and at the Town Hall take right fork with trolley into River Street, 65.8, cross a bridge, go up hill, take the left fork leaving trolley, 66.2, then bear left, 67.7, and follow the main road, approaching New Haven and Davenport Avenue; turn left into Forest Street, 72.9; then right into Derby Avenue, 73.9, near which is located the "Yale Bowl," 74.5.

Those holding tickets for portals numbered 11 to 24, inclusive, should use the West Parking Space, on Central Avenue, between Maltby Avenue and Chapel Street. This is reached by following Derby Avenue to Central Avenue, 74.2, where turn left to the West Parking Space, at 74.5. Those whose portal numbers are 1 to 10 and 23 to 30, inclusive, will find the East Parking Space located on Yale Avenue, between Derby Avenue and Chapel Street, the better. This space is reached by continuing on Derby Avenue to Yale Avenue, 74.8, where a left turn brings one to the East Parking Space at 75.0.

Another route is suggested from Stratford that will avoid some of the traffic on the direct road through Milford to New Haven. This route follows the Naugatuck River to Derby, then turning east to New Haven. This road is all good macadam and about six miles longer than the Stratford-Milford-New Haven route.

In Stratford, 61.1, at the water trough with the "A. C. A." signs, instead of turning right, as directed on the former route, go straight on under the railroad, 61.3, bear right, 62.3, bear left with trolley, 63.3, go under the railroad, 64; at a small church bear right, 66.5, pass Pine Rock Park, follow the main road and turn right in Shelton, 75.2. Cross a canal and bridge, 75.4, then turn right into Main Street in Derby, 75.5. Go straight on through the town, go over the railroad and cross a bridge over the Naugatuck River. Turn right and follow trolley tracks. The road becomes Derby Avenue, which is followed to Central Avenue, 79.7. From this point in New Haven the directions to the Parking Fields are the same as those given before.

Automobiles desiring to run in to the corner of College and Chapel Streets, New Haven, will continue on Congress Avenue to Davenport Avenue; thence to College Street. Motorists wishing to reach the centre of the city will continue on Congress Avenue. Automobiles eastbound on Derby Avenue who may wish to visit the centre of the city will go by way of Forest Street and Congress Avenue. Automobiles going from the centre of New Haven to the "Bowl" will travel by way of Elm Street, Whalley Avenue, Fountain Street, and McKinley Avenue to the Parking Space.

Returning from the game, motorists who desire to go to the centre of the city will do so through Whalley Avenue and Elm Street, using north sides of these streets, to Orange Street; if desiring to reach the vicinity of College and Chapel Streets, continue through Orange Street to Crown Street and turn west on Crown Street to College Street, then north on College Street. On College Street automobiles will be allowed to run in a northerly direction only between Crown and Elm Streets.

TOPICS FOR ROAD CONGRESS

Many Experts to Discuss Highway Work at Chicago Meeting.

Mayor Carter H. Harrison of Chicago has issued invitations to the Mayors of over 2,000 cities in the United States and Canada to send delegates to the Fifth American Good Roads Congress, which is also the eleventh annual convention of the American Road Builders' Association, and the Sixth Annual Good Roads Show, to be held at Chicago Dec. 14-18. Mayor Harrison suggests in his invitation that city engineers and street superintendents, or similar officials, be named among the delegates.

Secretary E. L. Powers of the Road Builders' Association is in receipt of a number of acceptances from those assigned by the Programme Committee to prepare the papers which will be used as texts for the discussions of the different subjects at the sessions of the convention. Copies of the papers so prepared will be furnished to the persons selected to lead and participate in the discussions. Each of these will prepare an address on the subject, with a view to bringing out all the facts and views and developments. After the paper and addresses have been presented at the convention the discussion will be open to all.

Among the acceptances so far received for the preparation of the paper the following may be mentioned:

L. A. Johnston, Division Engineer, Massachusetts Highway Commission, on the subject of road foundations; John N. Carlisle, Commissioner of Highways of New York, on the organization of a State highway department; Prof. T. R. Agg of the Highway Engineering Department of the Iowa State College, on the various uses and cars of machinery in road construction and maintenance; A. W. Dean, Chief Engineer, Massachusetts Highway Commission, on road traffic; John Laylin, Division Engineer, of Ohio, on brick roads and streets; H. J. Kuelling, County Commissioner, of Milwaukee, Wis., on concrete roads; William D. Uhler, Assistant Engineer of Highways, of Philadelphia, on bituminous construction and maintenance; Thomas H. MacDonald, State Highway Engineer, of Iowa, on street paving in small cities, and Clifford Older, Bridge Engineer, of Illinois, on surfaces or floors for bridges.

FOR SHOWROOM DISPLAY.

This Form of Exhibition Advocated for London in Place of Olympia.

There are two matters engaging the attention of English motorists at the present time. One has to do with the trade—a general showroom display of the cars for 1915 in London—and the other the use of private cars by their owners. As to the question of showroom shows, since the Olympia Exposition will not be held, it is believed that it would be a wise course for each motor manufacturer to invite the motor-using public to inspect his wares in the London depots during the next month. As a writer in The Motor Trader puts it:

"There are many direct benefits to the trade which flow from Olympia seldom alluded to when the question, to show or not to show, is on the tapis."

These benefits would also accrue to the industry by a series of showroom displays which the agents from all parts of the United Kingdom and colonies would attend.

A great number of the motor factories are at present engaged in making a variety of goods unconnected with their usual business. A time, however, will come when they will have to revert to ordinary conditions, and then, in the opinion of a London expert, unless the motor trade takes to some form of advertising as a protection against its rivals from the United States, it will have few orders in hand to deal with.

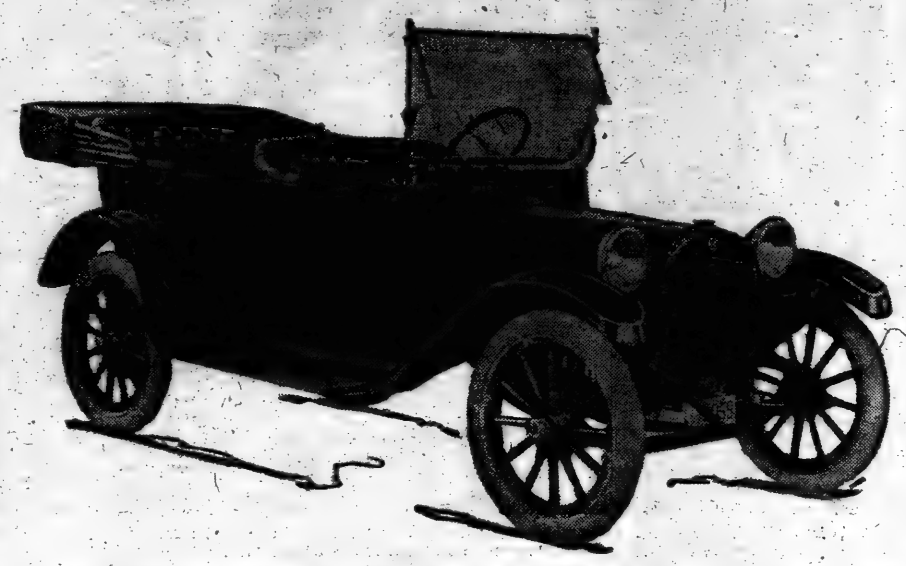
THIS IS THE "CAR OF MYSTERY."



The new Dodge Brothers motor car, the details of which have been kept secret ever since its prospective building was announced, is here shown for the first time. It is a four-cylinder touring car, to sell at $785. Some of its specifications are: cone clutch, en bloc motor of 3¾ bore by 4½ inch stroke, 30-35 horse power, water cooled. It has a tubular radiator and a single unit starter-generator and 12-volt battery. Ignition is by high-tension magneto and lubrication by splash and force feed. The gasoline is pressure fed from a fifteen-gallon tank hung in the rear. The rear axle is full floating, and the gear set of the selective type, with three speeds forward and reverse, and vanadium steel gears. Steering gear is of the irreversible type, and the car has left drive and centre control. The wheel base is 110 inches, and the passenger capacity five. Springs are of chrome vanadium steel, the wheels 32 by 3½ inches, and the tires of the straight side type, non-skid in the rear. Equipment includes rain vision wind shield, one-man top, jiffy curtains, electric lights, speedometer, electric horn, license brackets, &c. The shipping weight is about 2,200 pounds.

MANHATTAN BRIDGE APPROACHES DONE

Touring Bureau of the Three A's Says This Now Forms Best Route to Brooklyn.

The immense amount of automobile traffic between New York and Brooklyn divides itself naturally between the Williamsburg, Manhattan and old Brooklyn Bridges, the Queensboro Bridge being too far north to carry much of the travel between the two principal boroughs, according to the American Automobile Association. Up to this time most of the travel has used either the Williamsburg or the old Brooklyn Bridges, though the former gives an unduly long route and the latter is so crowded as to be almost dangerous on account of the incomplete approaches on both the Manhattan and Brooklyn sides of the Manhattan Bridge. The latter is not only conveniently placed midway between the two others, but by taking a diagonal course, it is the shortest of all.

Recently work on both Manhattan Bridge approaches, which has been in process for the last two or three years, has been practically completed, says the American Automobile Association Bureau, and henceforth a large proportion of the travel from New York through Brooklyn to Coney Island, Manhattan Beach, and south shore points beyond Brooklyn will take this route. This uses the most convenient connections from the middle or upper part of the city into either Lafayette Street or the Bowery, these streets being connected by Kenmare Street, (near the Williamsburg Bridge,) and Canal Street, (direct approach to the Manhattan Bridge.)

It is now possible to use the new route from either Canal Street or the Bowery on to the main structure, which, of course, provides excellent surface to the Brooklyn end. Meanwhile the completion of the work on that end has provided a short-cut connection into Flatbush Avenue, direct to Prospect Park Plaza.

By going through the park to Ocean Parkway, or by skirting the upper edge of the park to Eastern Parkway, excellent roads are had practically all the way through Brooklyn by either one of these routes. This is one of the most important of the various improvements in and about New York during the last year, and will greatly facilitate travel between New York and Coney Island next year, as, well as saving considerable time over the former route.

NO HEADLIGHTS IN LONDON.

Motorists Urged to Use Caution in the Dimly Lighted Streets.

Although England is not as yet under martial law, says The Auto of London, the conditions obtaining as a consequence of the war are abnormal, and the need for motorists and motor drivers to make cautious driving their watchword is emphasised. "While there may be some diversity of opinion as to the necessity of the order prohibiting the use of headlights on cars," it says, "some motorists deeming these more needful than ever if accidents in the dimly lighted streets are to be avoided—so far as we can see, no useful purpose can be served by raising a discussion on the point. All that we may hope is that the need for the order will not be of long duration, and that all intrusted with the driving of motor vehicles will do their share in making the thoroughfares of the metropolis safe equally to all users of the highways, and so render it unnecessary for the authorities to consider the question of enforcing a special speed limit between sunset and sunrise, as was suggested at the meeting of the London County Council last week.

"Incidentally, this new order of the Commissioner of Police may prove of lasting benefit to motorists, as by the results it should prove conclusively that, even under the most adverse circumstances, the claim that we and others for so many years have contended for is more than justified—viz., that 'driving to the danger of the public,' and not speed, is the dominating factor which should govern road traffic impartially."

Lloyd to Talk on Electrics.

Robert McAllister Lloyd, one of the pioneer factors in the electric vehicle industry and now a consulting engineer, will be the chief speaker at the November meeting of the local section of the Electric Vehicle Association of America. The meeting will be held in the auditorium of the Consolidated Gas Company, 130 East Fifteenth Street, on Tuesday night, at 8:15. The subject of Mr. Lloyd's address will be "The Influence of the Pioneer Spirit on Electric Vehicle Progress." It is expected that the new President of the association, John F. Gilchrist of Chicago, will be present. There will also be five-minute talks by other members of the electrical industry. The "E. V. A." as it is now popularly called, has fourteen sections and nearly 1,000 members.

Auto Exports Total $40,000,000.

Exports of Automobiles from the United States in the last fiscal year eclipsed all previous records, amounting to $40,000,000 in value. Figures issued by the Department of Commerce, however, show a remarkable decrease in the exports in August as a result of the European war, having fallen to 451 automobiles and motor trucks, compared with 2,004 in the corresponding period last year. Canada was the largest purchaser of automobiles.

Light Weight In Closed Cars

CHANDLER light-weight, which revolutionized touring car building is one of the chief features of the Chandler closed cars for 1915. Aluminum has replaced steel throughout in the construction of these bodies making it possible to drive them anywhere a touring car will go. Furthermore, they overcome the tremendous gasoline waste found in cumbersome closed cars.

The four closed models have all the elegance, comfort and luxury that enveloped car can offer. They meet all the requirements for winter city use. And their cost puts them within reach of the average purse. The flexibility and easy control of the Chandler Motor makes it specially adapted to city driving.

U. S. CARS FOR WOUNDED.

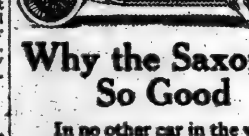
Paris Branch of American Company Kept Busy by the War.

Ambulance work has been added to the repertoire of roles assumed by automobiles operating under war conditions in and about Paris. Among the distinguished Americans who have volunteered for ambulance service is Robert Bacon, former American Ambassador to France. He visited the headquarters of the Packard Motor Car Company of Paris to purchase a car for American Ambulance Service use. R. N. Goode, the manager, expressed his desire to provide a car for ambulance service without charge, and to drive it himself. He immediately had a car equipped for the work. The first job was a dash for Colommiers with Mr. Bacon and two doctors to get a wounded English General. Mr. Bacon, in a small car furnished by the French Government, has since been accompanying Goode's ambulance on its various trips to rescue wounded warriors.

One of Goode's assistants, named Clarke, has left for volunteer service with the Third Army Signal Corps, driving one of the cars formerly operated in connection with the European rental service. His bunk-mate is Baron Henri de Rothschild, who volunteered for service in the English Army as chauffeur.

Upon the company's branch in Paris fell the burden of the second big rush from the city, when the German advance upon Paris became dangerous. Parisians of the highest circles started an immediate exodus for Havre, Brittany, and the South, to get boats for England. Paris offices of other foreign-made cars were closed, while French automobile concerns had all their cars requisitioned by the Government. Having the European rental cars at its disposal, and also by reason of its ability to obtain permits to leave the city and often to enter the military zone itself, the organization has been overwhelmed with demands upon it.

The New SAXON—$395



Why the Saxon is So Good

In no other car in the world do you get efficiency plus economy as in the Saxon.

No other car is more dependable—on boulevard, on hill, on country road. No other stands the gaff, endures punishment, stands up and keeps sweet running better than the Saxon.

8500 Saxon owners everywhere have found all this to be true. They have found the Saxon to be not only good-looking, but a good piece of machinery all the way through—a real car.

And they have found more to be true; for they cover 100 to 1000 miles as quickly, as surely, as comfortably—and more economically than in any other.

Here is an example—what one owner writes:

"I have just taken a trip in one of your Saxons over roads of sand and through swamps in Florida. A friend and myself drove 1600 miles, using 45 gallons of gasoline and three gallons of oil. We had no trouble whatever with the engine.

"I can state that the [illegible] in regard that no other car has ever equalled this trip over roads in right down, thus averaging 135 miles per day."

AUTO ENGINEERS TO FIX STANDARDS

At Meeting This Week Matters of Interest to Owners Will Come Up.

TIRE PRESSURE IS ONE

Others Include License Plates and Road Destruction—Makers Interested as Well.

During the three days of Nov. 17, 18, and 19 the Standards Committee of the Society of Automobile Engineers will hold a convention in the rooms of the society at 1,790 Broadway. From advices received by the society a representative attendance is expected, and it is hoped that the discussions held during the convention will result in the submission of a number of new standards for acceptance by the society at its next national meeting, Jan. 6 and 7.

The Ball and Roller Bearings Division has under consideration the recommendation of a list of stock sizes of roller bearings eliminating many of the sizes now listed by manufacturers, but seldom used in actual practice. At present manufacturers list almost 800 sizes, while it is believed that a list of fifty sizes will prove sufficient for all ordinary purposes. This standard, if adopted, will effect considerable savings to the manufacturers of complete automobiles as well as the part manufacturers.

Many of the new types of motors now being developed use a carbureter with side outlets. The Carbureter Fittings Division is expected to report on the feasibility of standardizing fittings for this type of carbureter. It is believed that it would prove of considerable advantage to manufacturers if a standard could be established in regard to both the shape and position of the flange on side outlet carbureters.

The Commercial Car Wheels Division has had under consideration the complaints which have been received with regard to the thickness of S. A. E. standard felloe bands on certain sizes of wheels. Makers of wood wheels for trucks have been invited to attend the convention and present their views to the division. If circumstances warrant, it is believed that a change in these standards will be recommended.

In addition to the work in hand, the Truck Standards Division and the Electric Vehicle Division will consider the recommendation of industrial truck standards. Advisory committees to take up capacity, speed and tires, and motors and voltage in the case of electric industrial trucks have been appointed. A committee of the Railway Electrical Engineers is co-operating with the S. A. E. in these recommendations. The Iron and Steel Division is expected to present data as to the physical properties of various S. A. E. steels and steel castings specifications. It will also bring up to date notes and instructions with regard to steel specifications and heat treatments.

The Miscellaneous Division has under consideration the pitch of treads above one and a half inches in diameter, a standard for speedometer driveshaft ends, and a standard for license pads. Practically all the States in the Union have provided the division with data as to the elements of legal pads, and many of them have advised the society that they would welcome the bringing about of this much-needed uniformity.

The last report of the Pleasure Car Wheels Division was not quite clear as to the oversized tires it would recommend being carried in stock by tire manufacturers and distributers. It is hoped that the forthcoming report will give this information and complete the report. This division will also attempt to have made a table of inflation pressures and permissible loads. These, when standardized, should be of material service to the public at large as well as to the manufacturers of cars and tires.

A formula for the road destructive effect of vehicles is under consideration by the Research Division. It will consider the matter solely from a scientific viewpoint, endeavoring to arrive at the proper factor. The universal application of such a formula is obvious. The Standards Exchange Division is considering standards for bell housings for unit power plants and standard design of motor supports. Both of these elements are subject to wide variations in current practice and it is believed that standardization will make for economy and efficiency.

There will be a meeting of the council of the society during the Standards Committee Convention as well as separate meetings of the various divisions or sub-committees.

ACTION ON FERRY CHARGES.

Uniform Classification of Vehicles by Dock Department Expected.

To secure official action on the claim that automobiles are discriminated against in connection with ferry charges, the Traffic Department of the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce announces that the matter will be taken up again shortly, in conjunction with other automobile associations and the Merchants' Association of New York.

When this subject was discussed before Dock Commissioner Smith in July, representatives of the manufacturers, dealers and users of trucks showed that these appeared to be discrimination on practically all ferries and railroads in the rates charged on self-propelling vehicles as compared with horse-drawn vehicles. The railroads asked for time in which to give the matter consideration, check over their schedules, and submit new tariffs for consideration. It was expected that this could be done within sixty days. Some delays were encountered, but the automobile and trucking interests are now hopeful of having the matter determined within a short time.

CURRENT NEWS AND NOTES OF THE AUTOMOBILE WORLD

MOTOR CYCLISTS HAVE MANY THRILLS IN WAR

Dispatch Riders with the British Forces Run Constant Gauntlet of Peril.

RIDE THROUGH SHELL FIRE

Noise of Engine Drowns Sentries' Challenges at Times—Wild Beasts on African Ride.

Thrills are part of the daily routine, apparently, of the motor cycle dispatch riders in the present war. Some experiences of riders attached to the British forces are related in The Motor Cycle of London as follows:

"We recently had an interesting conversation with Corporal F. A. Enders, R.E., who is home on convalescent furlough. He was attached to a cavalry division, and left England with several other motor cyclist dispatch riders. The party was split up at headquarters, Howard Newman, who is doing well, going to the First Army Corps.

"The distances covered by dispatch riders are not excessive, and usually amount to twenty or thirty miles at a stretch, but the work is continuous, and often Enders was on duty for twenty-four hours at a time, and he said that there were three things the motor cyclist had to make a point of getting—petrol, food, and oil. As his work was with the cavalry, he was right up in the firing line, and in the pursuit, after the battle of the Marne, they were always more or less under fire from the German rear guard artillery.

"Enders told us it was great sport rounding up the Germans after the battle, and he was enjoying life pretty well when he was struck by a glancing shot on the foot, but what really put him out of action was being kicked by an unpatriotic artillery horse on the ankle and in the stomach, which caused severe internal injury.

"He had to travel three days lying on straw in a cattle truck, and then came a gloriously comfortable voyage on a hospital ship to the English coast, followed by a spell in a hospital in Glasgow, miles away from his people, who live in London. Talking of his work, he said that by far the worst experiences he had to undergo were at night, when he was forced to ride without a lamp. The noise of the engine makes it impossible to hear a challenge of a sentry, and several times he was shot at.

"One of our men, he assured us, was shot clean through the head by a French sentry, to whom, in the dark, the British and German uniforms look very much alike. Once he saw the sentry just in time, and bringing his machine to a standstill found a long French bayonet three inches off his chest. Enders laid special stress upon the importance in driving steadily, so as to get there and save the machine as much as possible, and only of sprinting when real necessity for such action occured.

"One day last week we heard that Corporal I. Bethwaite, R. E., a well-known motor cyclist of Barrow-in-Furness, who has done good work in various competitions in Cumberland and the adjoining counties, was lying wounded in a hospital on the outskirts of London. We found Bethwaite pretty well, quite cheery, and full of praise for the excellent treatment he was receiving. He told us he had been in France since Aug. 8, when he landed at a western port and proceeded up country to the firing line. Three other motor cyclists were with him.

"The officers were delighted with the motor cycle riders and never ceased to praise their pluck, usefulness, and endurance. Bethwaite's happy career temporarily ended at the battle of the Aisne. He had been given an important dispatch to deliver and was traveling at a good speed along a road which was exposed to a heavy shell fire from the enemy.

"Great holes blown out by the 'Black Marias' were seen at frequent intervals, and suddenly one shell landed a hundred yards or so in front of him and exploded. Two great chasms had then to be dodged, and as he was executing this manoeuvre the ground gave way and he fell heavily, striking his head as he did so. He lay dazed for an hour, and then, pulling himself together, he set out to walk the rest of the way—two and one-half miles—and safely delivered the dispatch. The officer whom he had to see was much impressed by his pluck, and made him rest for an hour or two, and was loath to let him go at the end of that period; but go back he would, and walked to the machine, patched it up well enough to get back to headquarters, and finished his day's work. He did his best to carry on, but eventually he had to give in and go into hospital.

"He got very wily in dodging the shells, and on one road which he had to traverse there was a hill, the crest of which was much exposed, so he used to charge an almost vertical bank, slide down the other side, and ride for a time under cover. Once a fragment of shell cut the leather off the top of his boot. He had to get food and rest as best he could, and once had to go three days without either."

From a motor cycle dispatch rider in British East Africa The Daily Mail prints the following letter:

"The other night, when it was just getting dark, the Captain had to send some one to the next camp, and I was asked to go. It was 23 miles away, and there is only one road or track to it running right through jungle all the way. Off I went on the most exciting ride I have ever undertaken.

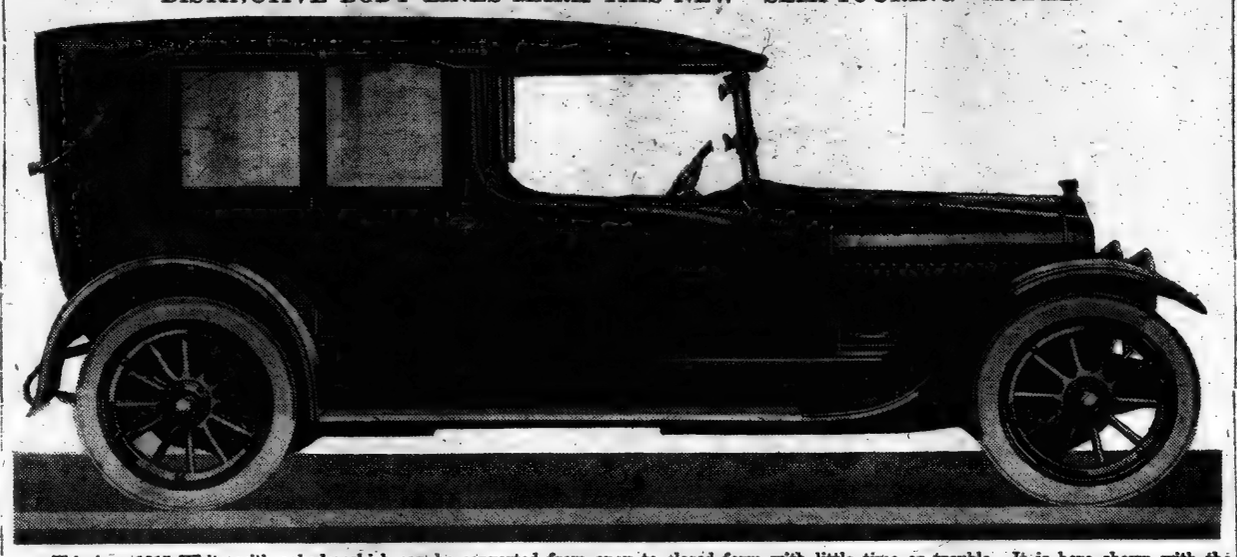
"I was fully armed with a service rifle and revolver, hunting knife, water-bottle, haversack, and ammunition. All that was on my back, including a bandolier, the whole lot weighing about 50 pounds. The first thing I ran into was a pack of baboons, some of them 5 feet in height. They ran in front of my light for about a mile. The brutes would not shift; you ought to have heard them bark. I rode behind one big brute within three yards of him. I would not have got into his clutches for all the money in the world. However, they at last turned off into the bush.

"The stray game that were hanging about that road—well, it is impossible to mention. I swore I would shoot some the next morning. I saw two fine leopards. One brute did not attempt to move until I was within three yards of him. I suppose he thought it wiser to get out of the road of the bright light and the roar of the engine. He opened his mouth and snarled, then sprang to one side, and I did not half go when I had passed him in case he took it into his head to follow me.

"Every one was up ready when I got there. They had heard me coming. I delivered my message to the Captain. Then he asked me into his tent and gave me something to eat and drink. I told him about the leopards I had seen, and he was very interested and said that just before I came in two of their sentries had been driven away from their posts by lions.

"When I was lying out under my blanket that night we could hear their roaring about a quarter of a mile away, and despite the wild beasts I slept as sound as if I were in my old bed at home."

DISTINCTIVE BODY LINES MARK THIS NEW "SEMI-TOURING" MODEL.



This is a 1915 White with a body which can be converted from open to closed form with little time or trouble. It is here shown with the top up and the windows closed. Note the long lines and the sweep of the cowl.

INTERESTING NEW AUTO MODELS OUT

Announcements Made of Eight, Six, and Four Cylinder Cars from $495 to $5,000.

Specifications and announcements of a number of new models have interested motorists recently. Some of the new things promised and performed are as follows:

An eight-cylinder announced by the King Motor Car Company at a price of less than $1,500 complete. The car is to have 40-45 horse power, but full mechanical details are not to be disclosed till Dec. 10. The new car will be exhibited in coming automobile shows.

After cautious experimenting, covering a period of many months, the Willys-Overland Company has announced the specifications of a six-cylinder Overland. The model is offered only in the single body design, and sells for $1,475, electrically lighted and started, and completely equipped. Wheelbase is 125 inches. With a bore of three and a half inches and a stroke of five and a quarter inches, the motor develops forty-five or more horse power at a normal engine speed. The cylinders are cast en bloc with the cylinder head detachable as a unit, exposing cylinders, pistons, valves, and valve chambers.

A new Stearns-Knight five-passenger touring car will sell for $1,750, completely equipped. It is the first one in the world to sell with a Knight-type motor for less than $2,000. It is a factory-built creation, guaranteed of forty horse power. There is a companion cabriolet for $2,250 and limousines for $2,850 up.

Philo E. Bemington, grandson of "the Father of American Gunmaking," has brought out a light roadster to sell for $495. The power plant is the unit type, including clutch and transmission; the motor has four cylinders, is water cooled, and is of the long-stroke type. The crank shaft is extremely large and the connecting rods are long, thus eliminating side thrust on the pistons. The gear set is of the selective sliding type, three speeds forward and reverse, with all gears of chrome nickel steel, and is operated by the Hollister automatic gear shift.

Announcement is made by R. E. Ingersoll, Manager of Eastern branches of the Reo Motor Car Company, of a coupé which has been added to the Reo line. This new job, which lists at $1,575, is built on the standard chassis and the body is interchangeable with that of the roadster.

The Cole Standard Four, a seven-passenger four-cylinder model, 120-inch wheelbase, weighing about 3,000 pounds, to retail at $1,485, nearly $200 less than the previous four-cylinder model, is announced by the Cole Motor Car Company. The new four body is a stream line design, having neither rise nor drop in cowl. The Stewart-Warner vacuum gravity gasoline control system is used on all models. The four carries the 4¼ by 5¼ Northway unit power plant, giving the car a rating of 40 horse power at 1,600 revolutions per minute.

Announcement has been made by officials of the Grant Motor Company, Findlay, Ohio, of a new six-cylinder model to sell at $795. The new six has a wheel base of 106 inches, and will carry full equipment, including electric lighting and starting apparatus. For purchasers who do not desire the electric lighting and starting system the price of the car will be $760, including acetylene lights.

Finley R. Porter, formerly Chief Engineer of the Mercer Automobile Company of Trenton, N. J., has organized the Finley Robertson Porter Company and has taken over the plant of the Metropole Motor Car Company at Port Jefferson, L. I., where he will produce a 100 horse power, 140-inch wheel base chassis, to sell for $5,000, with full electrical equipment. The motor has an A. L. A. M. rating of 34.2 horse power, and will develop 171 horse power. It is of the valve-in-the-head type, with four 4.6 by 6.75 inch cylinders, a single overhead cam shaft operating all valves. The piston displacement is 449 cubic inches. The officers of the new company are: President—Mr. Porter; Vice President—F. D. Veiller; Second Vice President—H. Adams; Secretary—C. H. Froelich; Treasurer—R. B. Porter.

In response to the demand for a car of this type the Haynes Company has announced a light six cabriolet. It may be converted from a roadster to a coupé or vice versa in less than a minute's time by a person within the car. When used as a roadster the plate glass windows are dropped into recesses in the doors and the curtains are kept in a carrying space built into the back of the seat.

TRUCKS FOR PAINTERS.

Motors Make Possible Moving of Men and Supplies Together.

One of the interesting truck developments is the motorizing of the painting and decorating trade. Contractors have found that with motor trucks they can move their men, ladders, and paraphernalia all at once and from one end of the city to another with the loss of a half-hour or an hour at the most. With the old way of horse transfer nothing but the equipment could be carried, the workers had to go by a street car, and a loss of a half-day and often a day resulted.

One of the most notable instances of the motorizing of a business, however, is that of the packing houses. One of the large concerns now is operating a fleet of over thirty trucks of one make, having purchased a number for its branches as well as its main plant.

ROAD CONDITIONS IN SEVERAL SECTIONS

Necessary Detours and Places of Good Going Along the Hudson River.

SOME BERKSHIRE ROUTES

A. C. A. Tells Where Caution Must Be Exercised In This Region—New Roads.

The roads are being worked in various sections along the Hudson, says the Bureau of Tours of the Automobile Club of America, and at present the road north of Tarrytown to Peekskill is under construction. The better way to Peekskill is by way of Briarcliff, Croton Lake, Yorktown Heights, and Yorktown to Peekskill. A part of this road from Yorktown to Peekskill was lately resurfaced.

From Peekskill to Poughkeepsie the direct State road through Fishkill Village is in fine condition excepting a short stretch through the village of Wappingers Falls. From Peekskill macadam is found to Garrison, followed by fair dirt road through Cold Spring to Beacon, then State road to Wappingers Falls.

The approaches to Poughkeepsie, both from the south and the north, are being laid with brick pavement. The detours are well marked over good roads. North of Poughkeepsie two detours are necessary before reaching Hudson. The first commences about one mile above Clay Hill, just north of Staatsburg, from which point the road is closed to the village line of Rhinebeck. This road is being resurfaced in places, and should not be closed, as the roadbed is hard and fairly good. The greater part of the detour is good, but the first part would require careful driving in wet weather, as the road is quite narrow, with several sharp reverse curves.

The other detour, just above Rhinebeck, is where the Astor State Road is closed for nearly its entire length. The detour should be used here, as the road under construction is not fit to drive over. The detour which follows the old Post Road is in very good condition, and is well posted. From Hudson the road is in good condition to Albany.

From Briarcliff good State road is found by way of Amawalk, Lincolndale, Somers, Brewster, Hoansburg, and Haviland Hollow to Pawling. This road is better than the Lake Mahopac-Carmel road to Pawling because of the stretch of dirt road near Lake Mahopac and a bridge that is down near Carmel.

North of Pawling, from Dover Plains to Wassaic, the road is closed. The detour is very poor, being over a narrow, winding road, with a poor surface and steep hills. In places two cars cannot pass, and part of the road runs across fields. From Pawling there are two roads to Poughkeepsie, both of which are in fair condition. One of these is over dirt roads through Stone House and Poughquag to Green Haven, where State road begins and runs by way of Stormville, East Fishkill, Wicopee, Brinckerhoff, Fishkill Village, and Wappingers Falls to Poughkeepsie. The other route is more direct, turning off at Stormville on fair dirt road, which is followed through Fishkill Plains, New Hackensack, and Red Oak Mills to Poughkeepsie.

The Berkshire Section.

Leaving Poughkeepsie, there is State road by way of Millbrook to Lithgow, part of this having been opened on Oct. 1. From Lithgow it is necessary to make a detour on account of the construction in progress over Delavergne Hill, west of Amenia. This detour, well marked with signboards, is over fair-surfaced narrow country road with sharp grades, leading from Lithgow to Wassaic, where a connection is made with State road going north through Amenia to Millerton.

A good connection for the Berkshires from points north of Poughkeepsie on the Hudson River is made by following the State road through Red Hook, Upper Red Hook, Clermont, and Blue Stores to Bell Pond. Here turn right and follow a good dirt road to Hollowville, where the State road from Hudson will be met and followed through Hillsdale to the Massachusetts State line.

There is a good State road extending from Hudson N. Y., eastward through Claverack, Hollowville, Crary ville, and Hillsdale to the Massachusetts State line. From this point to South Egremont the road has not been good.

Chief Engineer Dean of the Massachusetts Highway Commission reports that an appropriation has been made for the improvement of this road from the New York State line to South Egremont, and that the contract will probably be let about Nov. 1. He also says that it is quite probable that no detour will be necessary until next Spring, as a great deal of this work will be outside the limits of the present highway.

The road which was under construction south of Adams, on the main trunk route from Pittsfield to the north through Berkshire and Adams to North Adams, is completed and open to travel. This makes a good connection at North Adams for Williamstown and Manchester, also for the Mohawk Trail over the Hoosac Mountain to Greenfield.

RAN 7,500 MILES IN THIRTY DAYS WITH SEALED BONNET.

A 1915 Mitchell light four touring car on a chassis like this recently completed a gruelling test by making more than 250 miles a day for thirty consecutive days over all sorts of roads while the bonnet was under A. A. A. official seal.

FOR BICYCLE REAR LIGHTS.

Secretary of State Says They Protect the Rider as Well as Motorists.

"Every motorist," says Mitchell May, Secretary of State, "is painfully aware that the bicyclist is one of the chief trials of driving by night, because of the difficulty of distinguishing him.

"It was only recently that a law was passed compelling him to carry a rear lamp," said Mr. May last week, "or even a device for revealing his presence by reflecting the rays of lamps from the overtaking car. His front lamp is often so feeble that the patch of light it throws on the ground is not visible except at close range.

"Inasmuch as rear lamps on bicycles are enormous help to other drivers and valuable safeguards to the bicyclist himself, it is an interesting speculation why they are not more frequently adopted, especially since there is a legal obligation to carry them. Sometimes the reason would appear to be a lack of imagination—the same reason which leads some motorists to take risks that are a constant source of anxiety to the drivers of other vehicles, as the making of erratic movements in crowded thoroughfares or darting immediately in front of a heavy truck, which it is a physical impossibility to stop quickly.

"Sometimes the reason, it is to be feared, is a sort of defiant self-assertiveness; the bicyclist, riding the weakest vehicle upon the highway, feels that he is liable to be imposed upon, and accordingly thinks to assert his rights by adopting the attitude that he is free to use the road as he chooses; and that it is the business of other vehicles to keep clear of him whatever he may do. This attitude, of course, is entirely incompatible with what may be called the economy of road use."

TIME FOR HAULAGE CHANGE

War Purchases Afford Chance to Sell Horses and Buy Motor Trucks.

Conditions are more favorable now than they have ever been before for the adoption of motor trucks and delivery wagons by American business concerns, according to the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce. The demand for horses and mules for export to Europe gives an unexpected chance for large users of horses to sell them at good prices and use the money to buy power equipment.

Representatives of the English, French and Russian Governments, who are reported to have received orders during the last week in October for the purchase of 20,000 additional horses and mules, are reported to be paying a uniform price of $270 a head in East St. Louis. At Fort Worth, Texas, prices have advanced $17 over last year as a result of the demand. The first shipment on an order for 3,000 started for Montreal last week. Trainloads of horses and mules are going from the West and Southwest daily to Canada and Atlantic ports. Germany is said to be offering from $500 to $800 for good horses.

Europe has already begun to drain the United States and Canada of their surplus grain crop, and prices of corn, oats and hay are certain to rise. Exports of oats from July 1 to Oct. 24 were 22,000,000 bushels—just double the exports for the corresponding period last year. So it is going to cost more than ever before to maintain horses, the Chamber thinks.

Motor trucks and delivery wagons, on the other hand, are better and cheaper than ever before, with list prices already fixed for the next twelve months. Gasoline is lower than at any time since the motor vehicle became a factor in transportation. Rubber and rubber tires are also cheaper than heretofore, and with plantation rubber coming into market in ever-increasing quantities, continued reductions are anticipated.

BIG ENTRY FOR AUTO SHOW.

Four Floors of the Palace to be Used for Complete Cars.

So great has the demand of motor car makers been this season for space at the fifteenth annual National Automobile Show, to be held in Grand Central Palace, that for the first time four floors of the big building will be utilized for the display of complete cars. The show is scheduled to open Saturday, Jan. 2, and will continue until Jan. 9. Even with four floors available Manager S. A. Miles and the Show Committee find that they are unable to accommodate all of the applicants for exhibition space. Heretofore the fourth story of the Palace has been used exclusively for accessory exhibitors, but some of these will be obliged to get along with smaller space than in former years in order to make room for the complete cars.

Already 548 exhibitors are on the list for the New York and Chicago shows. Ninety-two complete car makers are on the list for the New York show and ninety-one for Chicago. Thirteen motorcycle makers will be represented at these shows.

AUTOMOBILE TRADE NOTES.

In the army of Ford employes the Triple Alliance is represented by 606 Germans, 268 Hungarians, 750 Rumanians, 388 Austrians, and 330 Syrians. There are also 81 Turks and 690 Italians and Sicilians. The Triple Entente, on the other hand, has among the Ford workers 330 English, 133 Scotch, 142 Irish, 226 Canadians, 3 Australians, 2,015 Russians, 2,677 Poles, 79 Lithuanians, 18 Croatians, 55 Frenchmen, 21 Danes, 6 Belgians, 26 Hollanders, 3 Japanese, and 219 Servians.

The assets of the Marion Motor Car Company of this city have been sold to James I. Handley, President of the company, for $130,000. The company has had a varied experience within the last few years, but it is now understood that J. I. Handley is arranging to surround himself with a strong organization and will soon have something interesting to offer the motor public.

At a meeting held by the foremen of the various departments of the Federal Rubber Manufacturing Company the other day a club was organized, to be known as the Federal Rubber Goodfellowship Club, for the purpose of accumulating a fund to bring good cheer into the homes of the needy at Christmas time.

A. S. Blakely, who has had charge of the publicity of the Cole Company since June 1, has been appointed newspaper advertising manager.

The total sales for the last business year of the Stevens-Duryea Company have been $3,506,500.94, as shown by its financial statement. Since engaging in business the company has manufactured and sold 14,000 motor cars. On a capital stock of $300,000 reserves for depreciation of $354,003.87 are shown, and a surplus of $2,975,595.22.

Announcement is made of the purchase of important interest in the Valvoline Oil Company by Henry W. Huckels, formerly President of the Columbia Motor Car Company of Hartford, Conn., and now with the Packard Motor Car Company of New York.

At the last meeting of the Directors of the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce, the Allen Motor Company of Fostoria, Ohio, was admitted to membership.

Owing to the general interest in factory safety movements, it may be interesting to note how the Goodrich organization operates. First there is a safety committee, with the president of the company as chairman, and a membership of nine men from various parts of the plant, who have opportunities for getting about. They report regularly on dangerous conditions. Each Safety Committeeman has charge of a certain department for inspection purposes. One result is that only four out of the 300 men on the committee have been victims of injury, serious or otherwise.

HOW WAR AFFECTED THE COTTON TRADE

BIG DROP IN EXPORTS

Less Than One-Third of What They Were a Year Ago—Big Supply in Warehouses.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 14.—American cotton spinners used less cotton during the first three months of the cotton year than they did in the same period last year; exports during October were less than one-third of what they were a year ago and almost a million bales more were in the hands of manufacturers and in warehouses at the end of October than there were last year at that time. This summarizes briefly the effect of the European war on the American cotton industry as disclosed today by the October cotton consumption and distribution report of the Census Bureau.

The United Kingdom during October increased its takings of American cotton, 252,065 bales having been exported to it. Germany received no American cotton, while France took 22,302 bales, the first it had received since the beginning of the war.

Cotton consumed during October was 451,841 bales exclusive of linters, compared with 511,022 in October last year. Consumption for the three months ending Oct. 31, was 1,250,715 bales, against 1,386,708 last year.

Cotton on hand Oct. 31, in manufacturing establishments was 713,407 bales, compared with 1,023,015 a year ago and in independent warehouses 3,780,036, compared with 2,509,658 a year ago.

Exports were 497,180 bales against 1,517,838 last year, and for the three months, 644,168 against 2,705,322 a year ago.

Imports were 12,132 bales against 5,569 last year, and for the three months, 54,554 against 20,908 a year ago.

Cotton spindles active numbered 30,651,946 against 30,855,360 a year ago.

Linters consumed were 29,101 bales against 31,335 a year ago, and for the three months, 81,770 bales against 85,682 last year; on hand in manufacturing establishments, 85,262 bales against 49,483 a year ago, and in independent warehouses, 48,047 against 38,057 a year ago.

Linters exported were 4,104 bales and for the three months 6,797 bales.

Wholesale commodities prices, as reflected by Dun's list, were somewhat more unsettled and weaker in tone last week than in the week ended Nov. 7. There were eighty-four changes in a list embracing 318 quotations, and, compared with the changes of the preceding week, there were two less advances and eleven more declines. The actual division of the week's fluctuations was thirty advances and fifty-four declines.

There were two features to the changes indicated. The first was the sharp upturn of prices on certain foodstuffs, and the second was the large number of changes that were shown in the markets for drugs, chemicals, and oils. In the foodstuffs markets, despite the weakened tone of the list, there were just three times as many advances as declines—a condition hitherto very rare, if not entirely unknown. And, strange to say, there were fewer changes in these markets than is ordinarily the case.

There was no great change in the price situation as concerns most fresh fruits, though some of the dried varieties declined. Fresh vegetables were steady for the most part, but a bit firmer here and there. In dairy products there was a notable increase in the price of butter and eggs, which, in both instances, may have been directly due to the epidemic of foot-and-mouth disease that is sweeping certain sections of the country. That these advances were wholly warranted is problematical, though, doubtless, eggs displaced meats on many of the tables in the affected districts. Cheese was slightly weaker.

There was no change in the price position of teas and coffees, and the ups and downs in the spice market were about evenly divided. Both raw and refined sugars were advanced, standard granulated moving up 10 cents a hundred pounds to $5.10. In flour there was no quotable change, and the grains were fairly steady at recent figures. An advance in wheat and declines in the price of corn, oats, and malting barley made up the changes in this part of the list. The major provisions at Chicago showed no great change. All of the fluctuations were upward, but they were confined to mess pork, prime lard, and bacon.

An easy market again prevailed in iron and steel products, with concessions not hard to get when real business was at stake. Coke was also lower. In the minor metals declines in copper, spelter, tin, and tin plate were contrasted with advances in lead and antimony. Business in hides was less active, but in spite of this several grades advanced. Leather was steady.

Drugs, chemicals, and oils together showed twenty-eight declines, against six advances, none of which was particularly significant. Several declines in paint prices, together with downward revisions of the figures quoted on crude rubber and hops and an advance in the price of turpentine, completed the listed changes.

NEW LIGHT THROWN ON PAISH'S MISSION

British Financier May Find Negotiations Here on Exchange Have Been Offset.

CONDITIONS NOW IMPROVED

Situation Has Changed Since English Expert Came Here with B. B. Blackitt by Invitation.

The inception of the plan for the establishment of a credit of $100,000,000 in London, in favor of American bankers, by the Bank of England, with the support of the British Government, the formulation of which was reported from Washington yesterday, goes back to the early days of the derangement in international exchange caused by the war. It was to try to put through this plan that Sir George Paish, financial adviser to the British Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Basil B. Blackitt were invited to come to this country and confer with Secretary McAdoo.

The plan first was talked of among individual bankers in this city, when foreign exchange conditions were at their worst, and after a fairly definite proposal had been worked out it was presented to Secretary McAdoo with a request that negotiations be opened with the British Government. After the English representatives arrived in this country there was a series of conferences in Washington, among them, Secretary McAdoo, members of the Federal Reserve Board, and leading bankers of this city. These negotiations have been continued more recently by a committee of bankers, consisting of Albert H. Wiggin, Benjamin Strong, Jr., and James Brown.

Meantime other measures had been taken toward restoring normal conditions in foreign exchange. The $100,000,000 syndicate to arrange for the payment in gold of the city's maturing obligations abroad, amounting to $80,000,000, was organized and a little later the $100,000,000 gold pool was formed and began selling exchange against its first and so far its only shipment of $10,000,000 to Ottawa for credit to the Bank of England.

The result was that the exchange situation improved to a marked extent and the necessity for the $100,000,000 credit in London became less obvious. Last week, owing mainly to the heavy purchases of war supplies by European nations and the prospective opening of the Federal Reserve Banks, exchange fell to normal, and it has remained well below the gold export point.

Under present conditions such a plan as that under negotiation with Sir George Paish probably would not be initiated, but it still is felt that its adoption would have a beneficial effect, at least sentimentally, although the need of it has been reduced to a minimum by the course of events since it was broached.

There are still elements of uncertainty in the Exchange situation, however. The chief of these is as to what may happen whenever the time comes for opening the Stock Exchange if that should be followed, as has been feared, by the selling of American securities on a huge scale by foreign investors. This fear has been greatly reduced recently by the continued easing of money conditions in London, but while the Bank of England credit, if its establishment is agreed to by the British Government, may never be utilized, it would be one more safeguard against the happening of the unexpected.

The working out of the plan now in shape for submittal to the British Government would be through the sale of exchange by the American bankers against the credit established by the Bank of England. The bills so drawn and sold to those having obligations to meet in London would not be redeemable by the American bankers for six months, by which time it is expected any further dislocation of the international situation that might arise would have been adjusted through the ordinary channels of trade, if, indeed, the current of payments had not long since set in the opposite direction.

CHICAGO RAILWAYS' INCOME.

Increase of $461,748 Over Last Year Shown in Joint Report.

Special to The New York Times.

CHICAGO, Nov. 14.—The joint income account issued by the Metropolitan West Side, Northwestern and South Side Elevated Railroads for the year ending June 30, 1914, as compared with the preceding fiscal year, shows that corporate income available for interest and dividends increased $461,748.

During the last year the roads expended $1,871,331 for construction and rehabilitation of their properties which has been financed partly by advances from the Chicago Elevated Railways.

Gross earnings for the year ended June 30, 1914, are shown at $8,182,861, an increase over the preceding year of $177,411, while net earnings are given at $4,333,836, an increase of $222,085. Expenses were $3396,965, an increase of $13,800.

CUT STATE INSURANCE RATE.

Workman's Compensation Commission Will Have New Schedule.

The Workmen's Compensation Commission announces that it expects to declare dividends averaging 15 per cent. on the first six months' business and to make a general reduction of the rates of the State Insurance Fund to take effect Jan. 1, 1915, which will bring these rates down to an average 20 per cent. below the present rates of the liability companies.

It is estimated that because of the low rates, its policy holders will make a total saving of approximately $250,000 on the six months' insurance, as compared with the amount which they would have paid for their insurance if placed with liability companies. The number of policy holders of the State Fund is now about 7,000, representing an annual premium of about $1,400,000, and an insured payroll of about $280,000,000. This volume of business is larger than that obtained by all the sixteen mutual associations combined, and it is exceeded by only one of the thirty stock companies writing compensation insurance.

COMMODITIES MARKETS

WHEAT.

The wheat market again showed heaviness during the early operations and prices declined about ½c under moderate liquidation over the week-end and in absence of aggressive demand. Toward the close a steadier tone developed and prices regained the early loss and final figures were ¼ ⅜c net higher. In the local cash market No. 2 red Winter wheat was quoted at $1.16⅛; No. 2 hard, $1.16¾; No. 1 Nor. Duluth, $1.17⅛; No. 1 Nor. Manitoba, $1.22, all nominal c. i. f. Buffalo to arrive.

CORN.

Receipts of corn at interior points on Saturday were 884,000 bushels, bringing the total for the week up to 4,332,000, compared with 2,816,000 last week, and 2,416,000 last year. This increase in the movement and prospects of liberal offerings from the country had a depressing influence on values, although there were evidences of a demand from abroad. Late in the day there was a partial reaction in sympathy with wheat, but final prices were ⅛ to ¼c. net lower. In the local cash market No. 2 yellow corn was quoted at 82¾c., cost, insurance, and freight, to arrive and prime Argentine at 78c., nominal delivered.

The local cash market was steady; standard quoted at 54 to 54¼c.; No. 2 white 54½ to 55c.; No. 3 white, 53½ to 54c.; No. 4 white, 53 to 53¼c.; fancy clipped white, 55¼ to 56½c.; ordinary clipped white, 53½ to 54½c., all elevator.

PROVISIONS.

The market for hog products was inactive, and after showing a moderate decline early due to some uncertainty regarding the probable effect of reopening the stock yards on Monday, prices hardened and closed steady in sympathy with grain. Estimated receipts at Chicago for Monday ranged from 12,000 to 20,000 hogs; Kansas City received 4,000 for the day and Omaha 8,400.

COTTON.

The Cotton Exchange floor was a very busy place on Saturday. Telephones were being installed, official notices issued, changes in firms made public, brokers recalled from vacations and quotation board put in order. Official announcement was received from Liverpool that beginning at 3 P. M. on Monday next that market will begin unrestricted trading in May-June onwards, except that no transactions further off than fifteen months will be permitted. Prior to 3 o'clock trading will be restricted to May-June only, as for the past few days. As New Orleans will reopen Monday also, it will mean a resumption of business on all the big exchanges with the beginning of the new week. Announcement was received late Saturday that New Orleans will close daily at 2 P. M. (3 o'clock New York time), except Saturday, when it will close at 11 A. M. (12 o'clock New York time).

COTTONSEED OIL.

Traders in the cottonseed oil market were more apathetic on Saturday and the volume of business was comparatively small. Trading seemed to be largely of an evening-up character, and in consequence price changes were irregular, the market closing at 5 points decline to 3 points net advance.

The range of contract prices was as follows:

COFFEE.

A holiday spirit prevailed in the coffee market on Saturday and the volume of business was comparatively small, sales through the liquidating committee amounting to 19,500 bags, of which the greater part was in the form of exchanges. Prices showed comparatively little change from final quotations of Friday and the undertone was steady with evidence that the recent decline has brought the market to a point where the trade is more disposed to favor the buying side. The local spot market was unchanged with Rio 7's quoted at 6¾c.

BUTTER AND EGG MARKET.

BUTTER.—Receipts yesterday, 3,921 packages. The slight weakness in fresh creamery which developed yesterday was more marked today, and it is quite probable that there would have been some shading of values if business would result. FINANCIAL MARKETS

Bank Figures Reflect Week's Improvement—The Influence of the New Reserve Banks.

A further decrease of $23,500,000 in the circulation of the national banks reported in yesterday's bank statement attested to the rapidity with which money market conditions at this centre are returning to normal. Before another bank statement is issued the reserve requirements will have changed, and, other things being equal, the surplus reserve of the banks largely increased by reason of the reduction in reserve requirements. That being so, less money market significance than otherwise would be the case attaches to the decrease of $8,500,000 in surplus reported yesterday.

The decline in interest rates during the week furnished outward evidence of the increasing comfort of the banking position. This, in part, but not solely by any means, has been due to the prospective establishment of the reserve banks as an incident of which member banks will hereafter have to carry a smaller proportion of reserves than has been required of national banks in the past. But beside this change in reserve, another and influential factor in easing the money market has been the fact that hereafter rediscount facilities will be available which have never been available in the past. Trade of desirable kind will not in future be confronted with the handicap that at times has been imposed in the past simply for the reason that the country's banking machinery was not adapted to meeting the full requirements of trade. The establishment of the new banking system by no means automatically does away with all chance of money market difficulties in the future, but it does reduce the number of causes likely to lead to such difficulties.

It is no longer being assumed in the financial district that all action toward reopening the Stock Exchange must be put over until after the end of the year. It is being found that such steps as have already been taken in the matter of lifting price restrictions instead of doing harm have actually done good. It is natural that this should dispel some of the apprehension which has been apparent in Stock Exchange circles over the possible consequences of resuming public trading in securities. Plans are now being discussed, not vaguely, with reference to some indefinite future period but practically with reference to the possibility of early action, and there is now reason for hoping that the problem will be worked out without any too long waiting. There are difficulties which have to be overcome, but overcoming difficulties is a routine element in successful endeavor. Moreover, the difficulties which have lain in the way of Stock Exchange resumption are each day becoming smaller.

Postage to New Zealand.

Consul Gen. J. I. Brittain writes from Auckland, New Zealand, as follows:

"The subject of short-paid postage on foreign mail matter is of especial interest here, where so many letters arrive from the United States with insufficient postage. Possibly the difficulty arises more from a general misunderstanding than from a neglect on the part of the American letter writer. Postage from the United States to New Zealand is five cents an ounce, while on letters from New Zealand to the United States it is one or two cents an ounce. When penalty postage is collected here it is never less than six cents on a letter bearing an American two-cent stamp, hence such letters are frequently refused."

Norwegians Get Whales.

Last year was a banner year for the Norwegian whaling industry, according to Consul General M. J. Hendrick, who is stationed at Christiania. The results of the year were 595,000 barrels of oil, together with bards, guano, and amber, to the estimated value of $9,648,000. Few new whaling boats were built. Two associations, the Norwegian Whalers' Association and the Whalers' Mutual Insurance Association, were formed, and they did a great deal to foster the industry. During the year operations were carried on in the waters near Iceland, Faroes, Shetlands, Hebrides, the west coast of Ireland, South Orkneys, Chile, Brazil, Alaska, West South, and East Africa, Australia, and in the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

STEEL MILLS WORK ON FULLER TIME

PITTSBURGH, Penn., Nov. 14.—Following a most discouraging report on Steel Corporation tonnage for October, which showed a falling off of 326,000 tons, the steel industry in Pittsburgh territory began showing a gradual increase in operating capacity this week. VARIED PHASES OF THE COUNTRY'S BUSINESS LIFE

THE MERCHANT'S POINT OF VIEW

Some of the Circumstances That Affect Mercantile Interests in Divers Ways.

What part confidence plays in inducing enterprise in business is an old story. Yet it is rare that confidence is born of any single circumstance or happening. The revival of confidence just now in the immediate future of trade is no exception to the general rule. A number of factors are at work to produce the result. Among them are the easing of the money market as shown in the reduced interest on commercial paper, the lowering of exchange, and the favoring trade balance which militate against gold exports, the forthcoming opening of the Cotton Exchanges and operation of the Federal Reserve Bank system. To a certain extent, also, the large purchases of supplies on account of the warring nations may be considered as having an influence in the same direction.

The Matter of Credit.

If money is the life blood of trade, credit—to continue the simile—is the heart which gives it its impulse through the arteries of commerce. Mills and stores and factories are continually borrowing. When their facilities in this direction are curtailed, their productive capacity is to the same extent diminished and enterprise lags. This is what has been happening for some time. Now the prospect is for a loosening of the purse strings so far as legitimate business is concerned. The rules, too, which have been laid down for the guidance of the banks under the system which goes into effect tomorrow do not interfere, as it was feared they might, with the customs to which business has been adapting itself for the last half century. Very wisely, it has been deemed advisable to make no discrimination against single name paper. But adequate precaution has been made for protection against overissue of notes by mercantile houses. Notice must be given by the latter of the amount of paper they intend to issue and the primary bank's assent is necessary before this amount can be exceeded. Then, too, the credit standing of a house must be had, and there is a limitation as to the amount that can be loaned to any person, firm, or corporation by a bank. In course of time there will grow up a perfect credit system, with information available to every bank under the Federal Reserve Board, that will tend to eliminate the unworthy borrower. This, in turn, is bound to help the worthy one.

As to the Cotton Exchanges.

It is not so long ago that there was some very violent criticism of the Cotton Exchanges and many were insistent that these institutions should be suppressed. They were declared to be merely gambling establishments run for the benefit of some betting men who knew nothing of cotton and cared less. In support of this was often cited the apocryphal story of a member to whom was shown a twig with a white puffy ball at the end, and who eagerly inquired of its possessor what it was. He was astonished, so the story ran, at being told it was cotton, and his rejoinder was that he had been a member of the Cotton Exchange for —— years and had never seen any of the fibre before. Now, when the Cotton Exchanges are on the verge of being opened again after having remained closed for a long period, not only is there no criticism, but everybody seems glad it is to happen. Not least among the satisfied are those who manage cotton mills. They have been holding back in entering on contracts for the future until they could see a market price fixed for the raw material they use. The spinners abroad, especially those of Great Britain who have been won't to take about forty per cent. of the exports of this material, have been in the same position. It is the general opinion that the opening of the Exchanges will do more to create a market for cotton than any possible occurrence could do. If the opening prices are not too high, the tendency is apt to be for mills to lay in a surplus stock against further needs and this will tend, in turn, to raise the price.

Cotton Demand from Abroad.

It is more than likely that other European countries will also bid for considerable American cotton at comparatvely low prices. This is especially true of Germany and Austria-Hungary. It is well to bear in mind, as to these two countries, that they have been accustomed to take considerable quantities of the material from other countries than this. India and Egypt have been among their sources of supply. From the first-named, the imports of cotton to Germany in the year 1913-14 were valued at $19,473,786, which was almost double that of the preceding year. Egypt furnished about 180,000 bales additional. It should be borne in mind that Germany has been an exporter of cotton as well as an importer, having furnished about 212,000 bales to Austria-Hungary, Russia, Switzerland, Netherlands, Italy, Belgium and other Continental countries. Austria-Hungary took from India alone, in the year 1913-14, cotton to the value of $9,486,755. From this country the direct imports only footed up $6,739,687. Both Germany and Austria-Hungary will, for some time to come, have to depend on this country for their supplies of cotton. It is not, of course, to be supposed that either of the two countries, with their export trade well-nigh obliterated, is able to make use of the large quantities which they have been accustomed to handle but, whatever the amount may be, it will have to be obtained here. There are pretty good evidences also that, despite their large importations of the material last year, and up to the beginning of hostilities, they have no large stocks on hand. This was conclusively shown as to Germany by the cabled reports the other day to the effect that cotton was selling at 18 cents a pound and upward there and that factories were clamoring for supplies. And there is evidence that the same condition exists in Austria-Hungary.

Consumption in Mills.

When it comes to the matter of cotton used in mills, the figures of the Census Bureau for October, given out yesterday, do not make a bad showing. The reduction, as compared with October, 1913, was about 12 per cent., the number of bales consumed being respectively 451,841 and 511,923. Much less cotton, however, was held in manufacturing establishments at the end of the month than at the same time last year, the difference being about 300,000 bales, or about 30 per cent. reduction. This is undoubtedly due to the uncertainty felt as to the future price of cotton and somewhat, also, to credit conditions. It is worth noting that the number of spindles active during October was practically the same as in the corresponding month last year. With something like fixity or standard of value for the raw material, there seems to be no reason why there should not soon be an increased output from the mills. The only disturbing factor is in the decisions of the general appraisers in interpreting the new tariff with regard to the Jacquard weaves. This will result in the importation of much yardage from Great Britain at prices which domestic manufacturers say they cannot meet.

Burlap Now Available.

Incidentally, also, the destruction of the German cruiser Emden is having an effect on the cotton goods situation. It will make it possible to be sure of obtaining an adequate supply of jute and burlaps from India, which has not been the case recently. Moreover, as the crop of the raw material is very large and some of the large European markets are cut off, the prices will be correspondingly low. In anticipation of a scarcity of burlap and partly for sentimental reasons, a certain number of concerns entered into agreements to make use of cotton bags or wrappings. Forty-inch sheetings were called for by the bag makers and the price of this kind of fabric went up. Now, when plenty of burlap is in sight, the price of the sheeting has gone down considerably and the bag makers, under their contracts, are paying at the higher rate. It is more than doubtful if even the cotton growers, who were urged to promote a greater consumption of their product by having their bales wrapped in cotton cloth, will do so now that the burlap is so much cheaper. Sentiment cuts a very small figure in business when it does not pay.

Embargo on Wool.

No material change in the situation as to wool occurred during the past week. The rigid embargo still continues against the exportation of wool from all the British colonies, and the home Government insists on guarantees that no wool obtained from them or articles made from the wool shall go to any nation with which it is at war. But the export of wool from this country to Canada, which was helping to deplete the domestic stocks, has been stopped because of the prevalence of the foot and mouth disease among cattle. Meanwhile, the Australian colonies have not been able to dispose of the large quantities of wool which they have on hand, and they are not likely to do so because the mother country alone cannot make use of so much. Sooner or later there is sure to be an outlet for the Australian and New Zealand wool, and this country is practically the only one that the material can find a market in. Meanwhile, the price of wool has been going up here, and this applies to the domestic article as well as to the imported. This is bound to have an effect on the prices of woolen and worsted cloths, which has been advanced with a prospect of a further rise. It is this circumstance which makes the woolen goods manufacturers view with something like complacence the cancellation of orders from customers who are disappointed by the slowness of business due to the continuance of balmy weather. The mill men are biding their time. When the customers come back they will pay more.

Troubles About Styles.

Conflicting reports come regarding the status of the Parisian makers of costumes. A number of them closed their shops shortly after the declaration of war. The general impression prevails that few, if any, new styles will be forthcoming for Spring, although this is denied by some importers who have come on from the French capital. The situation, however, has brought forcibly to general attention the fact that the dressmakers and manufacturers of women's costumes in this country are almost wholly lacking in initiative and are absolutely dependent for ideas on the Parisian designers. They show a queer helplessness in the matter, and seem to welcome eagerly any hopeful assurances that the foreigners will not fall them. Despite the enormous amount of business done in this country, there has been no concerted effort to encourage originality of design in women's dress. In Paris there is a general understanding each season among the costumers as to style. The variations are a matter of detail as a rule, and reflect the adaptive skill of the various designers. The aim seems to be that styles shall be in great measure uniform, showing, for instance, some particular period. Thus, when the hobble skirt appeared, every costumer showed some adaptation of it. The same was true of the slit skirt, the panniers, &c. Here there is no understanding whatever among those who show fashions. Each tries to get certain models from Paris and then makes such modifications as occur to him. What would happen if there were no Paris to draw on is a matter of conjecture. Perhaps the costumers, in such event, would hark back to the all-embracing blankets of aboriginal squaws.

FAULTY METHODS IN EXPORT TRADE

Hints from One Who Was Manufacturers' Advisory Agent in South America.

While the time to do actual business with South America may not at present be propitious, according to Louis G. Muniz, those domestic manufacturers who hope to benefit by conditions resulting from the war should speedily begin the study of the best merchandising methods to be followed out in acquiring Latin-American trade, so that when the credit situation in that country is relieved they may be in a position to do business. Mr. Muniz has spent five years in South America acting as the advisory agent for foreign manufacturers. His duty while in this position was to outline selling campaigns and report on the advisability of entering various kinds of merchandise into the different markets. When the war has ended, he believes that the demand for skilled workmen in Europe, together with the enormous war taxes bound to be levied, will so much add to the cost of manufacturing abroad that the producers here, if they are not able to sell their goods cheaper to South America, will at least find the cost of production in Europe on a par with that here. With our more aggressive selling and merchandising tactics the advantage, he believes, will all be with the American manufacturer.

"The lesson to be learned by the manufacturers of this country at the start," he said, "is that there is no need to imitate the methods of the Europeans. Your manufacturers are too prone to follow out in a strange country the methods of those who have proved successful in marketing their product in that country. This is a mistake as far as South America is concerned. The people down there are waking up to more modern ways of doing business. They admire the clean cut, efficient ways you have developed of accomplishing things, and I think are rather tired of the slow, ponderous efforts of the English and Germans who have exploited their markets. There is no need of imitation on the part of the American manufacturer entering the South American markets. The merchandising of the foreign manufacturers has become obsolete.

"Of course, the same plan in getting business cannot be followed out in South America as the domestic producer employs in the home markets. The channels of distribution must be studied and the article to be sold put up in a form that will be adapted to the needs of the particular country to which it is exported. The packing problem has been pretty well solved. By that I mean sufficient information is available on the subject to prevent any serious mistakes being made in the house that goes up the export business. The article must be made up to sell at varying prices according to the buying power of the country. Thus a package might be turned out to sell at 20 cents in one republic and in Argentina, where the purchasing power of the people is greater, a 50-cent package might be desired.

"As far as distribution goes, I have found in the past that the advantage has rested with the European manufacturer because his product does not pass through the many hands that the American concerns use to reach the Latin-American consumer. It is a source of wonder to the Latin-Americans that your manufacturers, usually so shrewd and sensible in their business, employ so many middlemen. The commission house could with ease be eliminated in dealing with the merchant in South America. It can scarcely be denied that by employing the commission house a good deal of trouble may be avoided, but there is no gainsaying the fact that the price of goods sold through these means is added to considerably. Many American manufacturers unable to meet the competition of the European manufacturers for this very reason. My experience has been that, where a producer complained that he was unable to meet competition or sell in the South American market, it was due to a faulty sales plan. A thorough analysis of the channels of distribution will often change an opinion regarding the ability to exploit a new market.

"The manufacturer who tackles the export business should determine at the outset whether it is better to employ his own selling staff, open up an exclusive agency or combine the two by putting a sales manager acquainted with all details of the business in charge of an organization made up of native salesmen. I have in mind the experience of a company that makes cash registers. At the start the exclusive agency plan was adopted. This did not give adequate results. A change was made by installing as sales manager a man who had formerly been assistant sales manager in this city. The selling staff was made up of natives who were instructed in American methods. During the last year, the company has sold five times the amount of machines it did previously in this territory, a quantity larger than that taken by England, Australia and Canada combined. The sales manager for this concern could not speak the language of the country in which he was stationed but, through the use of an interpreter, he was able to convey his aggressive ideas to the whole selling organization. Too often a house that does business in South America will permit that business to be built up through the individual enterprise of a lone salesman whose withdrawal from that concern will cut off its business in that market completely. I recall the case of a paint manufacturer who made this mistake.

"The salesman not only sold goods to the wholesalers in Latin America, but sold them under the guarantee that he would in turn sell them to jobber and dealer. He sold the goods mainly on his personality and, since he was able absolutely to control the distribution of the paints, he could dictate terms to the house employing him. They refused to pay him what he asked, and he immediately signed up with another paint manufacturer, swinging to the latter all the business he had worked up. This is only one of the improper methods that may wreck the plans of the house that enters the export business with South America. This and other questions must be thoroughly studied before a start is made by the manufacturer."

LATEST CUSTOMS RULINGS.

Duties Fixed by the Appraisers on Different Importations.

The Judkins & McCormick Co. was overruled yesterday by the Board of General Appraisers in protests relating to braids and hats imported under the Tariff Act of 1897. Lower rates than those assessed were claimed but, at the time set for the hearing, the protestants failed to submit adequate testimony. In view of this, Judge Howell assumes the proper rate of duty was taken on the goods and affirms the assessment.

R. H. Macy & Co. were sustained in protests dealing with the classification of statuettes entered under the Act of 1909. Duty was taken at the rate of 60 per cent. under a specific provision for statuettes. It was claimed, however, that as the articles are made of plaster of paris, they properly fall under the provision in the law for "manufacturers of plaster of paris." The Board agreed and ordered the goods admitted at 35 per cent. ad valorem.

Several importers lost in protests dealing with the classification under the old Act of catgut strings ready for use on musical instruments. The Collector took duty at the rate of 45 per cent as parts of musical instruments. Claims for free entry were made, and alternatively that duty should have been assessed at 25 per cent ad valorem. Judge McClelland holds that none of the claims is applicable. The importers included Carl Fischer, C. Bruno & Son, and R. F. Downing & Co.

CLAFLIN FIRM CHANGES.

Removal of a Number of Department Heads by Receivers.

The first direct steps in the reorganization of the H. B. Claflin Company have resulted in the removal of several of the prominent department heads. Among the men who have been let go are Henry S. Dale of the dress goods department, B. F. Larrabee of the knit goods department, E. Church and E. B. Brewster of the curtain and upholstery departments, W. P. Rea of the advertising department, and Edward Schofield, a general salesman.

Rumor had it that other department heads were also to go, but the reports could not be confirmed yesterday. There were also reports regarding the successors of the deposed heads, but nothing was given out concerning this point by those in authority. It was stated, too, that none of the assistants of the deposed heads would be elevated to chiefs of departments, but that the new department managers would be men hitherto unconnected with the Claflin establishment.

No little comment was heard in the Worth Street dry goods district yesterday concerning the changes. There was talk to the effect that the changes had been made as a result of wire-pulling by certain commission houses, and there were rumors that they had resulted from advice coming to the receivers from an interior source. While reports of pressure on the receivers were denied, it was regarded as significant by men close to the organization that all of the deposed heads were men who had not taken kindly to certain changes instituted or contemplated by one of the younger officers of the H. B. Claflin Company.

Joseph B. Martindale, head of the Chemical National Bank and one of the receivers of the Claflin Company, would not comment on the changes beyond saying that they were made after a careful and thorough study of conditions in the jobbing house by the receivers. Their object, he said, was to increase the efficiency of the organization, to decrease expenses, and by so doing to increase profits.

No comment was made by the deposed department executives talked with yesterday by a TIMES reporter beyond the statement that there had been an utter lack of the personal touch in the receivership, in other words, it was said that at no time had the receivers discussed department problems with the men at the head of them, all answers to questions and required data having been given through some third person. One of the sorest points with these men was that the personal element was so far ignored that the dismissals themselves came in the form of letters.

TO HELP SMALL BUYERS.

Purposes of the Newly Organized Merchandise Exchange.

Considerable interest is being shown in local wholesale circles in the General Merchandise Exchange, Incorporated, an association of dry goods merchants which was incorporated under the laws of this State recently. The objects of the Exchange are to obtain proper representation in this city for its members; to have a staff of buyers and merchandise men continually looking for new things for the members; to keep them constantly in touch, through descriptive reports, with the trend of fashion, the newest bargains, and the change of prices affecting every department of the members' stores; to maintain a packing department to which small shipments may be delivered and combined; to enable the members to buy staple articles in dozen quantities at the jobbers' quantity cost; to enable its members to combat the mail-order houses and to compete in certain lines with the syndicate five and ten cent stores.

The General Merchandise Exchange is affiliated with the United Buyers Service, Incorporated, which embraces 375 stores, as well as with the Five and Ten Cent Exchange, Incorporated, which has permanent exhibits of more than 350 manufacturers of these lines. It is also affiliated with the J. E. Manix Company, a resident buyer concern which represents sixty of the largest department stores in the country. The officers follow: President—Samuel Margolis; First Vice President—J. E. Manix; Second Vice President—Herman Gerstman; Treasurer—Sydney Konheim; Secretary—Charles D. Bailey. The offices of the Exchange are situated at 11 West Nineteenth Street.

How the Retailer Got the Style.

A leading costume house in this city recently had an experience that shows the lengths to which retailers will go to obtain exclusive models. This concern received a letter from a large customer in Chicago to whom they had confined their styles for that city, complaining that a certain specialty shop had displayed in its show windows the identical costumes that were supposed to be restricted. It looks for a time as if the account would be unjustly lost since the manufacturer was positive that the garments had not been obtained from him by the specialty shop or any retailer in the vicinity of the city. Finally the solution to the mystery was arrived at when a special order was given the specialty shop necessitating an order for a costume in a certain color. In due course, the special order came through to the manufacturer from a house in Ohio. In the hem of the skirt was sewed the name of the retailer and date of shipment. The garment was purchased from the specialty shop in Chicago and identified by this mark and the retailer in Ohio, who had been supplying the Chicago house, was cut off from the list of the manufacturer's accounts.

Champagne Is Saved.

Consul General A. M. Thackara, Paris, reports that it has been possible to save the vintage in Champagne, thanks to the presence in that region of many refugees from the north. The question of transportation alone has presented difficulties. In ordinary times the manufacturers of champagne purchase the grapes directly and transport them to their presses, but, owing to the shortage of vehicles this year, the owners of the vineyards will be obliged to press the grapes themselves and to store the juice in barrels until the transportation problem is solved. From inquiry it results that the reserves of champagne wine have not been touched, for the Germans have simply taken such wine from the cellars of private houses and hotels. They have not drawn on the cellars of the large manufacturers.

WHERE IT PAYS TO BE CAREFUL

Too Much Duty Is Often Paid by Importers Who Fail to Attend to Details.

Decisions by the Board of General Appraisers furnish evidence that importers are losing thousands of dollars in duties paid to the Government on foreign merchandise through carelessness or negligence in the filing of protests. Complaint from the importing fraternity is common enough that the Government's exactions are onerous and frequently disproportionate to the value of the merchandise so assessed. This may or may not be so, according to the point of view.

At the same time there is no question that merchants in the import business have only themselves to thank for being obliged to pay duties that could have been avoided had due care been exercised at the time alleged excessive duties were collected on a given entry. Observers are of the opinion that at the present time, when close figuring is so essential to trade success, importers should be wide awake in their dealings with the Custom House. Scarcely a day passes that importers' protests are not either overruled or dismissed by the Board of General Appraisers for no other reason than that protests are faulty in one respect or another.

Inspection of the decisions made for a considerable period back discloses that the importer who suffers by his own negligence is not by any means the man making infrequent entries, who thereby might be excused for his ignorance of customs requirements, but includes also firms having daily relations with the Custom House authorities and who, it would be assumed, are entirely familiar with the practices in vogue to insure correct protests.

Perhaps the most conspicuous illustration of this failure to protect their own interests in a monetary way are the large number of protests filed during the past few months claiming a rebate of 5 per cent. on importations brought to this country in both American and foreign ships. These protests are filed in the hope that the Supreme Court of the United States will ultimately decide that the provision in the present tariff for the discount must be given effect. In a very large proportion of these protests, importers failed to submit to the Board of General Appraisers any testimony showing the registry of the vessel transporting goods figuring in the tariff suit. Needless to say, all such claims are overruled as reached by the customs tribunal with the result that, should the court of last resort finally decide that the discount must be effective, such importers will be barred from receiving the 5 per cent. refund. The proper evidence, not having been produced before the board, cannot be received on appeal by the United States Court of Customs Appeals.

Another common mistake on the part of importers, and even their attorneys, is the filing of protests against the exactions of Collectors with the Classification Division of the Board of General Appraisers instead of applying to the Reappraisement Department for relief. Similar errors are made by appealing for reappraisement when the case properly belongs to the Classification Board. Mistaken remedy appeals are always dismissed, with the attending loss of time, and, frequently, money. Under the procedure established by the board, notices as to the time and place of holding hearings are mailed to importers to the end that they or their legal representatives may be present and submit evidence in support of the contention for lower duty. Many protests are annually overruled because no appearance is noted at the date of trial.

Importers, as well as public institutions, are sufferers from non-compliance with regulations of the Treasury Department additional to the tariff law itself relative to the identification of certain lines of merchandise for which the tariff specifically prides free entry. For instance, the law specifies that articles for presentation to a religious or educational organization are exempt from duty, provided rules laid down by the Secretary of the Treasury are complied with. The same is true of articles purchased by the order of public institutions. Scientific apparatus for institutions also is admitted free, provided the regulations are followed. This applies also to antiques. Every year thousands of dollars are sacrificed to the Government revenues due to the ignoring of these rules.

The question of the sufficiency of protests comes up practically every day in the year. If importers' protests are loosely drawn or indefinite, they are sure to be challenged by the lawyers representing the Department of Justice. In such cases the board, while inclined to stretch the rule of judicial procedure in favor of the protestant, often has no other alternative than to dismiss the faulty protest. Another avenue opening to losses is ignorance of the law or mistaken remedy. That is, to appeal to the Board of General Appraisers for relief when the complaint should be lodged elsewhere.

An official of the board said yesterday that most of the omissions and lack of compliance with the law and regulations appear to be due to carelessness, although a small proportion of the protests are undoubtedly filed by persons unfamiliar with customs procedure. It happens frequently that importers submit their cases on the local Appraiser's report without making any attempt to produce witnesses or evidence. The official gave it as his view that if importers have sufficient interest to file a protest in the first instance they should back it up by evidence at the hearing to the best of their ability. He added that while it would be difficult to form a definite estimate of the amount of money lost annually to importers by carelessness or noncompliance with the regulations, the sum is large.

PARIS LEADS IN STYLES.

Reasons Given by Retailer Why This Is Apt to Continue.

A review of all that has been said since the war started regarding the possibility of New York superseding Paris as a style centre leads those interested in the movement to the inevitable conclusion that, while American designers are good imitators, they do not possess, or at least have not shown, creative ability. There is no dissenting opinion offered to deny that in very many cases the fashions originating in Paris are improved and rendered more suitable to the taste of American women by our designers, but the fact remains that conditions of situation and temperament prevent the success of the propaganda to make the manufacturers of women's apparel on this side independent of Paris.

A representative retailer, in commenting on the question of style leadership, said that no matter where the American women get their styles while the war is in progress, once it is over they will again demand Parisian fashions. He does not occupy a position where he might be set down as prejudiced, since it would be much to his benefit if this market actually became the style centre. As it is now, he must retain an expensive buying staff to make frequent visits to Paris. He must purchase a number of models and go to a large amount of trouble to get ideas for reproduction here by the manufacturers who supply him. If he could feel assured that American styles were what the women here demanded, he would be under much less expense.

"As French is the diplomatic language," he said, "so French styles may be called international. Women dressed as Paris dictates can feel that their attire is up to the minute in whatever capital in Europe they may visit. Thus Paris is the clearing house for styles, and rightly so because it is the artistic centre of the world. In other words, the French capital is admirably situated for this purpose. Paris is the Mecca for the American and Continental tourist just as it is the headquarters of European society. New York can make no such claims and, just as the situation of a store is all important, so also is the location of the style centre a prime requisite to its success. When New York becomes the meeting place of the world's elite, it may then easily become the fountain head of fashions.

"I mentioned the fact that Paris takes first rank in the art world, and this naturally implies that her people are of a temperament fitted for creative work. The Frenchwoman of fashion does not wish to appear in the same costume as her sister. She goes to her dressmaker with suggestions for adding a distinctive note to her dress. It is her desire to be different that distinguishes her from most American women. Here, there seems to be a fast iron-bound rule that unless one woman wears practically the same style as another, she is not in fashion. Consequently, you have the buyer dependent on the manufacturer for his ideas on what the women will wear. You have the rather absurd spectacle of conventions called to determine what the style in this or that article of feminine attire shall be. No manufacturer wants to go wrong, by that I mean make something different from what the next man will make. The long and short coat situation is ample demonstration of what the result of such things lead to. It is evidence, also, of the American women's desire to be dressed alike. On the head of this fiasco, comes the report that many designers in this city have been discharged because of their failure to prophesy correctly. If New York is to supersede Paris as a style centre, and, for the reasons I have enumerated, I can't see how such a thing is to be expected the evolution in leadership is going to create endless confusion in this market among manufacturers and retailers alike. There will be some who will stick by Paris and others who will take an independent course. The buyers are confronted by this divided opinion, the uncertainty that now exists will only be a molehill alongside of the mountain of confusion that will result. To my mind there can be no standardization of styles on this side except along very general lines."

Boost the List Price.

The practice of certain retailers of asking special discounts, even when countenanced by the manufacturers who do business with them, is not profitable for them. Thus, one store asks a discount of 20 per cent. The manufacturer merely marks his list price up 20 per cent. in order that the may obtain his regular profit. The marking up frequently allows a greater profit, however, for the manufacturer, since there are certain selling prices, and the difference between the marked-up price and this selling price is always additional margin for him. Of course, the stranger to the game may be "stung" once and give 20 per cent. off his regular figure to secure business, but after the first mistake it is the retailer and not he who suffers.

Potato Starch for Brazil.

This is an opportune time to introduce American potato starch in the Brazilian market, according to Vice Consul General Albro L. Burnell, Rio de Janeiro, as the war in Europe has at least temporarily cut off the supply of this and many other articles consumed in large quantities. Potato starch came principally from Germany and France before the war. On account of the financial crisis and general business depression prevailing in Brazil, Mr. Burnell says that American manufacturers are cautioned not to extend credit except when the position of the buying firm has been investigated by reliable persons.

Raw Silk Prices Are Steady.

The Yokohama raw silk market is rather quiet, according to cables received by A. P. Villa & Bros., with prices unchanged. From Canton comes the report that the market is dull and irregular. Prices at Shanghai continue unchanged despite the lack of trading there. The Milan market is reported a trifle easier, but the demand for these silks at the present time is rather small. In New York a distinctly better feeling is in evidence. Manufacturers of silks are getting rid of their stocks in good shape, and the whole trade seems more optimistic concerning the future.

DYESTUFFS SHIP COMES INTO PORT

Matanzas Arrived Yesterday with Large Cargo of Different German Colors.

With 3,200 tons of German-made dyestuffs aboard, the steamer Matanzas yesterday steamed up the bay and docked at Pier B, Jersey City, adjoining the old Pennsylvania Railroad terminal. The ship left Rotterdam Oct. 30, and, according to Capt. A. C. Davis, her skipper, encountered rough weather most of the way across the Atlantic. This forced the vessel to slow down and accounts for the delay in her arrival, which was scheduled for last Monday.

The Matanzas's cargo, which is practically a capacity one for this ship, represents the first large direct consignment of colors to be sent to this country from Germany since the outbreak of the European war, and was arranged for by a special committee of dyestuff importers, headed by Herman A. Metz, President of the Farbwerke-Hoechst Company of this city. The committee had the co-operation of the Department of State and the German authorities, who expedited the passage of the goods out of Germany, via the Rhine to Rotterdam, where they were put aboard the Matanzas.

An inspection of the Matanzas's manifest shows that she brought good-sized quantities of almost all the colors and ingredients so urgently needed by manufacturers in this country. While the consignment of indigo paste is not as large as had been hoped for by some of the color handlers, a sufficient quantity was received to keep the mills busy until the arrival here next week of the steamer Sun, which is following the Matanzas.

Altogether, about twelve firms engaged in the dyestuffs importing business in this city, were the consignees of the cargo of the Matanzas. The Cassella Color Company was the largest individual beneficiary, this firm receiving 3,984 casks manifested as "coal tar dyes." The Farbwerke-Hoechst Company came next with 3,489 casks and packages of dyestuffs of all kinds, while William C. Mitchell, acting as agent for the Badische Company, followed with 2,229 packages.

Other consignments were as follows: Geigy ter Meer, 625 casks and packages aniline colors; William F. Wiener, 459 packages aniline colors and 10 casks metachrome mordant; Edgar Fischer, 120 casks coal tar colors; Geisenheimer & Co., 3 cases and 496 casks aniline colors; C. Bischoff & Co., 29 casks aniline colors; Heller & Merz Co., 107 casks aniline colors, and Bayer & Co., 1,900 casks aniline colors. The goods consigned to Bischoff & Co., a banking and commission house, are understood to be for the account of one or more textile manufacturing plants who bought direct.

The Farbwerke-Hoechst Company's consignment is typical of the rest of the cargo carried by the Matanzas. This firm's consignment contains such items as 500 casks of sulphur colors, 200 casks dyeing materials, 148 casks alizarine colors, 335 casks dyeing materials and allied products. The Cassella Color Company received 1,054 packages of indigo paste which, so far as could be learned, was the largest single lot of this class of merchandise brought over by the dyestuffs ship. Other firms received smaller lots. There were good-sized lots of alizarine paste, the Cassella Color Company taking 524 packages, with other firms running smaller quantities. The same concern received 214 casks of dry alizarine paste.

The shippers of the dyestuffs were F. A. Voigt & Co., Binneveld & Scheltern, H. D. ter Haas, G. Ruff, C. E. Ringgrove & Co., and J. F. Vervloet & Co. Speculation was rife as to the value of the cargo. C. H. Ruhl, to whom the Matanzas is consigned, said he could give no estimate, while Mr. Metz appeared to be unwilling to say anything calculated to throw light on the subject. In some quarters the Matanza's cargo is estimated at close to $1,000,000, and possibly more. The indications are that from now on fair quantities of dyestuffs will reach here from Germany in monthly installments based on the average American consumption per month, the past five years being taken as a basis for the allotment to be made by Germany to this country.

The dyestuffs must be brought here in a vessel flying the American flag, as was the case in the Matanzas's shipment. The German Government further requires a guarantee from the importers that none of the colors or materials shall be re-exported. Unloading of the cargo will begin tomorrow morning.

AT FALL RIVER MILLS.

Fair Amount of Sales the Past Week, Mainly on Wide Goods.

FALL RIVER, Nov. 14.—After several weeks of good business, trading in the print cloth market fell off quite a little and conditions are relatively quiet. Inquiry for both wide and medium wide goods has been rather brisk all week, but manufacturers have held firmly for higher prices and have succeeded in securing better prices for certain styles. The total sales for the week will exceed 175,000 pieces and, while this amount is much lower than the total of the two preceding weeks, still it is considerably above some of the totals some few weeks ago. When buyers saw that they were unable to get goods for immediate delivery, they busied themselves in scouting about and placed some contracts which will not mature till well into next year. This gives the assurance to some mills that their machinery will be kept busy for about six months of 1915.

The attention of buyers centered upon wide and medium wide goods and mills making these styles did a very good business. The spurt noted last week in narrow styles has diminished and conditions in the narrow end of the market are again quiet. The call for sateens and twills has been encouraging while that for the medium weights has met with some response from buyers. Some of the mills which have been curtailing have been favored with sizable orders and should market conditions improve these mills will resume operations in full and with their full complement of help. Just now some mills have reduced their weekly production because of slow business and it would require something more definite than alluring prospects to cause them to start in full.

It is very likely that when the New York Cotton Exchange opens on Monday the complexion of the market will change, but to what extent will not be known till after a few days' business shall have been done. Cotton can be bought landed in Fall River between 7 and 8 cents per pound depending upon the type to be used. The quotations:

Printcloths Fairly Active.

The absence of some important market personages, who went to Princeton, lessened trading in the gray goods market somewhat yesterday, though there was a fairly large business done. A few more sales of 38½-inch 60-48s were made for 1915 delivery at 3¾ cents, as were some for the current year's shipment. Buyers were again bidding 3½ cents for four-yard nights, while for next year's delivery, but the mills were holding firm for 5⅝ and 5¾ cents. There was a firmer tone to 38½-inch 64-60s, and there are only a few of these goods now obtainable at 3¾ cents. No 1915 deliveries of them can now be got at that price, while there was some good contract business done on the basis of 3⅝ cents for 40-inch, 4.25-yard goods. The closing printcloth prices were:

Joan of Arc, by Boutet de Monvel with a narrative and description written for The New York Times by the deceased artist's son,—ROGER BOUTET de MONVEL.

THESE paintings are owned by Senator William A. Clark and are reproduced by The New York Times with his special permission. The pictures are printed on special paper by the best three-color process, similar to that used in The Times's reproductions of "The Holy Grail," the Morgan and the Altman Collections. One of them occupies a double page, in size 13½ x 31 inches, the others are 9½ x 21 inches, and the first page is 15 x 17 inches. Each picture is well worth preserving and if bought at an art store would cost many times the price of The Sunday Times The cost of these reproductions to The New York Times is more than $10,000, which makes it necessary to limit the edition to regular readers. It is intended as a gift to them. The edition of The New York Times for December 6th will be limited to the advance orders. No additional copies can be had after this edition is exhausted.
